

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

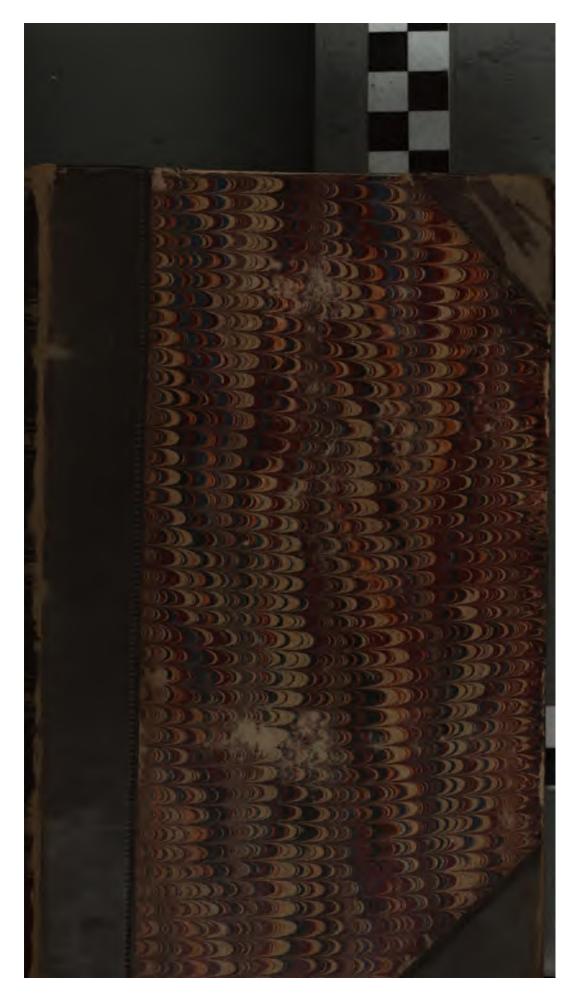

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/

55. a. 36.

AN

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY

O F

SCOTLAND;

FROM

THE FIRST APPEARANCE OF CHRISTIANITY IN THAT KINGDOM,

PRESENT TIME

E M R ON THE MOST IMPORTANT OCCURRENCES,

IN A SERIES OF LETTERS TO A FRIEND.

B Y

THE REVEREND JOHN SKINNER, A PRESBYTER OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN SCOTLAND. AT LONGSIDE, ABERDEENSHIRE.

VOLUME I.

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR T. EVANS, PATER-NOSTER ROW; AND R. N. CHEYNE, EDINBURGH. MDCCLXXXVIII.

ΑD

FILIUM EPISCOPUM.

Quem adjuvet 'O Méyas 'Apxiegeue,

AUCTORIS DEDICATIO.

A CCIPE, chare mihi duplici nunc nomine amoris,

Et Pater officio, et sanguine Nate, mihi, Accipe, sed facilis, quatuor collecta per annos

Quæ quondam licuit scripta vocasse Patris,

Parva quidem, sed non parvo congesta labore,

Atque utinam multo digna labore putes. Non ego tanto operi fatis apta juvamina jacto

Qualia Doctorum commoda vulgus habet.

Non mihi facundæ vires, nec copia linguæ, Nec thecas onerat lectio larga meas.

Rusticus, et pauper, libris peregrinus et aulis,

Vix mihi quæ placeant scribere digna queo.

At non spernendum forsan, nec inutile prorsus,

Hoc rudibus, quale est, invenietur opus. Fortè bonorum inter selecta volumina Fratrum

Implebit vacuum pagina nostra locum:

Nec deerit, spero, qui mei memor unus et alter

Colliget ex istis paucula mella favis.

Non famam Historici celebris, nec prœmia capto:
Non honor ingenio convenit ille meo.

Fortè et epistolicum meritò metuenda lacessent

Verbere non parco critica flagra modum:

24

At nostri moris modus hic, quo sæpius olim

Monstravit

Monstravit calamum charta pusilla meum. Quod potui, feci: Nec sum qui talia docti Sperarem laudes promeritura chori.

Sit laus una mihi, facram docuisse cohortem

Quam, regit officii cura paterna tui,

Quomodo ab antiquis parva hæc Ecclesia seclis Veniret ad nostras continuata manus, Pura quidem, depressa licet, contemptaque mundo.

At Capiti in cœlis charior inde suo:

Hanc volui primæ tandem ad vestigia formæ

Ductam per varias exposuisse vices.

Pars fuit et voti, si qua nunc fallere possem Arte senectutis tædia dura pigræ.

Non folitum robur mihi nunc, nec, ut antè, labores Languida consuetos carpere membra valent.

Diu mihi quo cani caput invafere capilli,

Jamque supra decimum me tria lustra pre-

At manet ingenium, manet inconcussa facultas, Lassitiemque levans utilitatis amor.

Qualia funt, tu ne mediocria nostra recuses, Quicquid censuræ gens inimica dabit.

Tu mihi confilium præbebas primus, opemque,

Tu mihi scribendi suasor et auctor eras.

Nunc igitur scripto solitum dignare favorem,

Auxiliumque operi, quod potes, adde tuum.

Sic plures per te liber hic numerabit amicos, Qui, fine te, parvi forsan habendus erit.

Vive, vale, titulo diu post mea funera dignus Præsulis, et grato gratus et ipse gregi: Tuque mihi tamdiu solamen quale dedisti, Diu det solamen stirps tua tale Tibi!

CONTENTS of VOL. I.

LETTER I.

Introduction — General Description of Christianity and its Progress — Origin and Antiquity of the Scots — Various and uncertain Accounts of both.

Page

Page

Page

LETTER II.

Confused State of our earliest Scottish History — Uncertain Account of our first Conversion to Christianity, as given by Fordun — Enlarged on by Boece and others—Characters and Inconsistencies of these Writers. 23—38.

LETTER III.

Mission and Coming of Palladius — A Passage of Prosper telating to it — Another of Fordun — Both properly explained — Story of the Expulsion and Restoration of the Scots considered — Probable Account of their Conversion to Christianity, and of all that Passagus did among them.

LETTER IV.

LETTER V.

Mission of Augustin into Britain by Pope Gregory—Consequences of it—Account of the Ecclesiastical Histo-(a) rian rian Bede—And of the Piclish Churches, as recorded by him and others—Story of Regulus with the Relicts of St. Andrew—Account of the Piclish Church concluded.

82-g

LETTER VI.

Farther Account of Columba, and of the Monastery which he founded in Hy—— Passage of Bede relating to it——
Story of Columba recorded by Adamnanus—— Mission of Aidan, Finan and Colman, from the Monastery of Hy, to the Northumbrian Church—— These three proved to be Bishops of Lindisfarne in that Church.

94—10

LETTER VII.

Controversy between the Church of Rome and the British Churches about the keeping of Easter—Share of the Scottish Bishops of Lindisfarne in that Controversy—
The Northumbrian King decides in favour of the Romish Party, and puts an end to the Scottish Mission. 109—12

LETTER VIII.

Inflances of Arrogance in the Church of Rome — The Pictifb and Scottifb Churches at last comply with the Romish Gustoms — And for some Time sink into Obscuritr. 124—13

LETTER IX.

View of Church Affairs abroad—Account of the General Councils—The Worship of Images established in the Romish Church—Opposed by Charlemagne—Liberality of that Prince to the See of Rome—Foundation of the Papal Grandeur—Observations on the Characters of the primitive Bishops.

LETTER X.

Observations on the State of the Pictish Church and Nation——— Its Union with the Scottish under Kenneth Mac Alpine—— Character of that Prince——— His Removal

Page

moval of the Episcopal See from Abernethy to St. Andrews—Account of the Culdees. 153-168.

LETTER XI.

Two Objections to Diocelan Episcopacy answered—State of the Scottish Church, from the Time of Kenneth MacAlpine, to the Death of Gregory the Great. 168—184

LETTER XII.

Rights of the Scottish Churches confirmed in an Assembly at Scoon—Bishop Fothad expelled from St. Andrews by Indulphus—Kellach Bishop of that See goes to Rome for the Confirmation of his Title to it—Remarks on the Tyranny of the Romish Church, in imposing such Journeys.

LETTER XIII.

Bestruelm, a Scottifb Bishop, invited to an English Council, to defend the Marriage of the Clergy — Historical Account of the Controversy on that Subject — Reafons against the Gelibacy imposed in the Church of Rome 194—206.

LETTER XIV.

Change of the Regal Succession by Kenneth III. and Murder of his Nephew Malcolm—— His Repentance and Application to the Bishops and Clergy—— Accession of Malcolm II. who founded an Episcopal See at Mortlich, afterwards removed to Aberdeen—— Reflections on his Bounty to the Courch, and that of his Great Grandson Malcolm III.——Character of that King, and of his Queen St. Margaret.

LETTER XV.

Accession of King Edgar — His Donation of Coldingham
Abbey to the Benedictines — Account of that and other Monastic Orders — Remarks on the various Kinds of Monasteries and Monks — Account of the Croisades. 220—228.

(a 2) LETTER

L E T T E R XVI.

Accession of Alexander I.—His Resolution in the Affair of Eadmer elect Bishop of St. Andrews——Account of the Controversy about the Investiture of Bishops.

228—239.

L E T T E R XVII.

Bounty of King David to the Church—His Character uindicated—Decretals of Popes compiled by Gratian

Two national Councils held, one at Roxburgh, the other at Carlifle—Accession and short Reign of Malcolm IV.— Account of Peter Lombard, &c.—And of the School-divinity.

240—255.

LETTER XVIII.

Accession of William the Lion, and State of the Church in bis Reign— Claim of Metropolitical Authority over the Scottist Church by the Archbistop of York, confidered—Distressing Consequences of that Claim—William founds the Abbey of Aberbrothock to the Memory of Thomas Becket—Remarks on his Character and Canonization— Account of Bistop Scott of Dunkeld, with Reslections—Effects of Papal Ambition—Four Councils held in Scotland.

L E T T E R XIX.

Accession of Alexander II. — Council of Lateran held at Rome, in which were three Scottish Bishops — Canon made in favour of Transsubstantiation — Historical Account of that Dostrine. 281-295.

LETTER XX.

The Kingdom of Scotland laid under an Interdict—Reflections on this cruel Invention, as practifed by the Church of Rome—The Pope fends Legates into Scotland for raifing Contributions—Holds a Council at Lyons, and depofes the Emperor—Authorites provincial cial Councils in Scotland — Introduction of two new Monastic Orders into this Kingdom. 296-309.

LETTER XXI.

Accession of Alexander III. — He recovers the Western Isles, and adds another Bishopric to the National Church — Struggles against the Coming of more Legates from Rome, but in vain — Various other Instances of Papal Oppression — Untimely Death of Alexander III.

LETTER XXII.

Death of Margaret, Grandchild of Alexander III.—
Competition for the Crown between Bruce and Baliol — Behaviour of the Clergy— And of the Pope on this Occasion— Success and Reign of Robert— His Death and Character— Account of John Scott of Dunse, and other Scottish Writers— And of the Knights Templars, and Knights of Malta

322—335.

L E T T E R XXIII.

Accession of David II. — Troubles of his Reign, and State of the Church — He dies and is succeeded by his Nephew Robert II. ——Schism in the Papal See — Account of Wickliff — His Character and Writings.

336-345.

L E T T E R XXIV.

Peaceable Accession of John, by the Name of Robert III.

— Revolution in England — Conduct of the Pope
on this Occasion — Quiet State of Things in Scotland — Character and Death of Robert III. 346-354

L E T T E R XXV.

Regency of the Duke of Albany—Burning of Heretics begun—The Practice brought from England into Scot-land—Continuance of the Papal Schifm—University of St. Andrews founded by Bisbop Wardlaw—Gouncil of Constance condemns John Huss --- Takes the Eucharific Cup from the Laity — Deposes the three rival Popes, and elects another — The Scottish Church at last acknowledges the new Pope - And hoids a national Council by her own authority. 355-375.

Page

LETTE R XXVI.

James I. released from his Captivity in England - Reforms Abuses both in Church and State-Persecution of the Followers of Wickliff and Hujs - Council of Bafil makes a new Rufture in the Papal See- James I. barbarously murdered. 376 - 387.

LETTER XXVII.

Accession of James II. — Quiet State of the Scottish Church in his Reign— St. Salvator's College at St. Andrews founded by Bisbop Kennedy -- College of Glas-. gow begun by Bisbop Turnbull - Invention of the Art of Printing - K. James k lied by an Accident at Rox. burgh --- Bad Effects of his Son's Minority --- Account of the Promotion and Projecution of the first Archbisbop of St Andrews-Remarks on that Affair -Tragical End of James III. - Reflections on Bucha-388-406. nan's Account of it.

LETTER XXVIII.

Accession and prudent Behaviour of James IV. --- State of the Church in his Reign -The See of Glafgow made an Archbishoprick -- That of St. Andrews successive. ly filled with two Youths — University and King's College of Aberdeen sounded by Bishop Elphinstone—
James IV with the Flower of his Nobility killed at Flowden - Reflections on that fatal Event. 407-421.

LETTER XXIX.

The Duke of Albany chosen Regent in the Place of the Queen Mother - Contention about filling the Sees of St. Andrews and Aberdeen --- The Reformation in Germany

Page

Germany carried on by Martin Luther and others—Brought into Scotland by Patrick Hamilton, Abhot of Ferne, who suffered for it—Various Instances of Persecution on the same Account—The Resormers abroad called Protestants.

421-438.

L E T T E R XXX.

State of Ecclesaftical Affairs in England—Henry VIII.

throws off the Pope's Supremacy, and is acknowledged as Head of the English Church—Tendency in Scotlan! towards Reformation—Prevented by the Clergy's Influence with the King, and by the Zeal of Cardinal Beton—Death of James V.—Proceedings of the Protestants in Germany—Account of John Calvin, and his Model of a Church at Geneva—Of Ignatius Loyola, and his Institution of the Order of Jesuits.

439—474.

ERRATA IN VOL. I.

			•
Page 29	Line	22	for "histo" read "history."
	_		for "England's" read "Scotland's."
21		laft	leave out the comma between Tiro and Prosper-
7/		2 7	for "light" read "weight."
51		21	for "Politus" read "Potitus."
	_		for "Columbus" read "Columba's."
77		19	for "Columbus" read "Columbas."
91		18	for "Elke" read "Ulke."
104	-	22	for "name of their confecrations" read "names of " their confecrators."
107	, —	23	for "mnnner" read "manner."
160	_	28-29	for " previous" read " precious."
173	3 —	5	for "on enlargement" read "an enlargement."
180	, –	34	for "Elfinus" read "Etfinus."
10	; —	ĭ	for "of the head of the English Church" read "of
- 7.	,		" the English Church."
28/	-	28	for "as well feculars" read "as well as feculars."
			for "Innocent II." read "Innocent III."
29	4 —	1/	for "Randulphus" read "Pandulphus."
	7 —		for 6 and Giorgiand 66 and Giorgia
	2 —		for "ptactice" read "practice."
34	2 —	13	for "wordly" read "worldly."
34	3 —	28	for "displine" read "discipline."
35	1 —	8	for "Ball" read "Bull."
40	4 —	10	for "farher" read "father."
43	ė —	7-8	for "impetial" read "imperial."
		•	•

ETT E R I.

Introduction—General Description of Christianity, and its Progress-Origin and Antiquity of the Scots-Various and uncertain Accounts of both.

SIR,

EFORE I enter on the task you have imposed LETTER upon me, I ought, if it were only in compliance with common form, to plead my infufficiency for it. However, as this, in many cases, is no more than form, I shall not take up your time with it; nor trouble you with a tedious apology for the many defects you will meet with, in this performance. In a work of fuch complicated labour, wherein I have hardly been able to fatisfy myself, I can much lefs expect to give general fatisfaction to others; efpecially when I fee that fo many able undertakers before me have failed in answering that expectation. One great difficulty presented itself at my first setting out: and that was, how to reconcile my regard for our national honour, with the opinion I find myself obliged to give of the authorities, on which is founded our claim to that high antiquity, and long lift of kings, held forth by fome as the peculiar glory of our nation.

It is indeed the ecclesiastical part of our history, which you feem to be most folicitous about: desirous, as you say you are, to discover when and how

10

LETTER bow Christianity was first introduced, and has been all along continued in this division of Britain, which has so long been known by the appellation of Scotland. And certainly it is a laudable curiofity in any one who thinks Christianity a blessing, to wish for as much information as he can get, about the time when, and the means whereby, such a blessing was originally conveyed, and has been progressively handed down, to a people who are happy in the possession of it. The case is very different with respect to what is called Natural Religion, which, if there be such a thing, we are supposed to have entirely within ourselves, and need not be at any trouble to feek elsewhere for the beginning and progress of it. Perhaps the great fonduess for that fanciful scheme, which has so much and so long prevailed, may be in some measure owing to this advantageous circumstance in its favour, that it costs no pains, and requires no laborious investigation to account for the way of coming by it. But Christianity is of a quite different construction: and the specialities of it, which are many and wonderful, could never have been known, nor the benefits of it enjoyed, by mankind, without being first published and continually conveyed, from some quarter, and by some means exteriour to ourselves. So these things become a very proper object of fearch and examination, to all who have that regard for our holy religion, which the importance of it deserves. As a person who finds himself in posfession of a good estate, will not only think it necesfary to know the extent and profits of it, as prefently possessed by him, but will also wish to learn at what time, and by what conveyance it came first to his ancestors, and through what intermediate steps, the fuccession to it has devolved upon him: so is the

the case with regard to the benefits of Christianity LETTER which by those who have a just sense of them I. will always be esteemed a most valuable possession: not purchased by our own industry, but derived originally from an Author, and conveyed down to our times by ways and means of that Author's own appointment, and under the direction of his providential care. It is 'therefore well worth our while to inquire into, and get ourselves as much acquainted as possible with these particulars; which if not absolutely necessary to be universally known, yet when known, must be acknowledged to be both entertaining and edifying.

Now as to the time when that noble scheme of Religion, distinguished by the name of Christianity, made its first appearance in the world, and bow and where it was originally published, we have fussicient information from these cotemporary records, which we all receive as authentic. From these we learn, that the knowledge of a Christ actually come for the falvation of mankind, in accomplishment of the old promifes of a Christ to come, was notified, some more than 1700 years ago, to a fmall corner of the earth, where the old people of God dwelt, and from thence, was after Christ's ascension published, or in facred style preached, to fome of the neighbouring nations, by particular persons called Apostles, peculiarly chosen, authoritatively commissioned, and properly enabled by CHRIST, for that purpose. All this is what every professor of Christianity is more or less acquainted with, as the scripture history which all have, or ought to have in their hands, goes thus far. But if we inquire farther, when or how this or that particular nation, or kingdom or people, especially in these northern parts of the Gentile world to

I. which we belong, was first blest with the salutary and illuminating influence of the Gospel, here we feel ourselves greatly at a loss, for want of sufficient direction, and therefore seem less desirous to push the inquiry so far as might be expected. Yet though we cannot attain to such entire satisfaction as results from irrefragable evidence, when we wish to trace the first dawnings of the evangelical light in our land, we may still meet with some very agreeable discoveries, and be able to form such rational conclusions, as will pave the way towards further researches, till we come to an era of sacts, ascertained by the consentient testimony of uncontroverted documents.

This is all that can be expected on the subject before us, and in this expectation I would endeavour to gratify you, if it were possible, without entering into, or even touching at, any thing relative to our original as a nation. But to avoid this is hardly possible. For the various accounts of our first civil constitution, under the several forms in which it is represented, are so connected with, and interwoven through, the little ecclesiastical intelligence we have to depend on; and our conversion to Christianity puts on so many different appearances. according to the different schemes and eras of our national fettlement, that there is really no separat. ing them from one another, or in other words. there is no possibility of sketching out a history of our early church, without examining the history of our early state likewise. And this it is which so much straitens me, and embarasses any attempt to arrive at the least degree of certainty in these matters.

I am abundantly fensible how much it makes for the honour of our nation to sustain the modern accounts of our high antiquities; and to carry our monarchy as far back as the old heathen Fergus.

ſon

fon of Ferchard, three hundred years and more be- LETTER fore the Incarnation. But however much I feel for the dignity of my country, I cannot digest so many gross improbabilities as appear on the face of this favourite hypothesis, nor bring myself to believe fuch a doubtful, and unauthenticated detail, even after all the pains that a Boece, or a Buchanan has taken to put it together, and fet it off. In this too I am warranted by no less authority than that of the famed Buchanan himself, who, however much prejudiced and partial in fome things, was undoubtedly an able master in critical know-In his preliminary differtations, prefixed to his history, I meet with these two excellent rules for the trial and better discovery of genuine, and falle antiquities, "That it is a great prefumption " against the truth of any relation, when the first " reporters live at a great distance from the times "wherein the facts are faid to have happened." And, "That where modern historians differ from "the antient Romans in matters transacted in " the days of their first Emperors, we are not rash-" ly to believe them." By these two rules if we examine the current of the Scottish histories, we shall often find ourselves involved in a cloud of uncertainty, where we would wish to meet with the greatest clearness. At the same time, though I thus hefitate about admitting the finely polished descriptions which Boece has given us of these early times, unknown to his predecessor Fordun, and differently represented by his successor Buchanan, yet I cannot altogether agree to the degrading fyitem adopted by Archbishop Usher, Bishop Stillingfleet, and fundry others, who would make us be-· lieve that because no Roman writer mentions the Scots by name, till about 360 years after Christ, when Ammianus Marcellinus speaks of them, there-

LETTER therefore there was no fuch people any where in Britain till that time. In confutation of which

I. Britain till that time. In confutation of which way of arguing I do not infift on the disputable passage in Seneca's Satire on the death of the Emperor Claudius, whether the Brigantes men-

Rer. Scot. lib. 2. Britannia.

Scoti.

Buchanan after the younger Scaliger would have it, or Scutabrigantes, as Camden on the faith of all the copies reads it. Neither do I think it material whether what S. Jerom in his letter to Ctcsiphon quotes of Porphyry, naming the Scottish nations in his books written in the year 267 be Porphyry's his books written in the year 267, be Porphyry's Introducown words, as Mr Goodall contends, or only St tion to the late edition Jerom's own way of expressing Pophyry's sentiment, of Fordun, as Mr Tho. Innes endeavours to demonstrate. The Cap. 10. Critical Es. principal argument which weighs with me is, that critical Ef. Philippar argument which weights with the is, that any, p. 514. the fame objection will hold against another remarkable nation, whom these very writers acknowledge to have been early inhabitants of the north of Britain, and from whom I doubt not but many of the inhabitants of what is now called Scotland are descended: I mean the people known by the name of Picts, or, as the vulgar call them, Peghts, who are not spoken of under that name, by any Roman writer, much before the Scots, and whom not only Buchanan, but even Camden, and the other opposers of the Scotch antiquities acknowledge to have been the Caledonians, who fought so bravely against the Roman general Agricola, and gave the Emperor Severus himself so much trouble about an hundred years after.

It may therefore be supposed that Caledonians was a general name for all the tribes or clans on the north side of the friths of Forth and Clyde, under various chiestains, and perhaps under various forms of government, sometimes at war with one another, another, and fometimes uniting together against LETTER any common enemy or invader. Certain it is, that Cafar, and the other Roman writers describe the old inhabitants of what is now called England in this very manner, as distinguished among themselves by various appellations of Trinobantes, Belgæ, Iceni, &c. but uniting in any common caule, under the general designation of Britons. So we read of the Suevi, on the great continent of Germany, a powerful and warlike people, and made up of a number of inferior tribes, under particular names, and of particular characters. It is highly probable that the case was the same with the old Caledonians. And if, upon this supposition, one of these many tribes, perhaps the greatelt and most conspicuous of them, began in process of time, and upon a nearer acquaintance, to be distinguished by the Romans under the denomination of Picli, from their continuing the custom of painting their bodies, as is the common opinion, or which is as likely, from some other peculiarity about them, which in their language might bear fome affinity to the Latin inflection, why may we not conclude that fome fuch peculiarity in another tribe of these Caledonians, might also have given rise to the Latin name of Scoti *? You know the chi-

^{*} In support of this conjecture, there is a similar explication to be found in Carion's chronicle, as published by Peucer, B. 4. of three of the Germanic nations, whom Pliny and other Roman chorographers mention under the Latinized names of Ingroones, Islands, & Vandali; that the Ingevones were the Indigenz, or old indwellers, from the German word Inwoner, which signifies to dwell in; the Vandali denoted travellers, either foreigners or merchants, from the German wandelen, to wander, and the Islandser, and whose country to this day is called Westphalia. It is certain, the Romans used to bring the merical

LETTER merical fancy of the Scots getting their name fr the old Egyptian lady Scota, which once made fi

a figure in our chronicles, is now justly explod fince Buchanan treated it with deferved ridicule. when we are told, that the Scots came origina either to Ireland or Britain, out of Scythia, were therefore called Scyths or Scots, and ar ments are brought forward to justify this, from British and German language, is there not roon object against this derivation, and to ask why Picts were not called Scots too, fince the Sa gives it as the current tradition in his time, that Picts came directly from Scythia, and confequer had as good a title to the name of their old cour as any others. But the truth is, I lay no str either on the argument or the objection. Neit should I think it material to our present business go through all the different and irreconcileable counts of the origin of the Scots, or of the co try from which they first came into Britain, if opinion commonly received were not made fuc handle of, to raise a confusion in our ecclesiastical quiries, and perplex us about the time and met of our earliest conversion to the Christian sa native names or distinctions of the several people whom conquered, as near as they could to the grammar of their language; and there are few of these barbarous names of me nations in Czesar, Tacitus, &c. but have a proper meaning in respective languages of the several nations, though none at : the language of their Roman conquerors. So has the case ! in all probability, with the Picts and Scots, who are the Northern nations of Britain best known to the Romans, whom I take to have been two divisions, and these the most spicuous, of the so famous Caledonians.

Historian Bede, who wrote a thousand years a Lib. I. Cap. 7.

But this being the case, there is a necessity of inc ring a little into this vulgar opinion, and exan

ing the grounds on which it seems to be founded. LETTER You know the current belief is, that the Scots are of Irish extraction, and came over from Ireland three hundred and thirty years before the Incarnation, say some; sive hundred years after it, fay others. So here is a difference of no less than eight hundred and odd years: Consequently both accounts cannot be right: But both may be Only in this they agree, that both bring the Scots from Ireland. Yet there is no absolute certainty of Ireland being the mother country of the Scots in Britain, any more than there is of Britain being the mother country of the people of Ireland. The argument from the fameness of language amongst the Irish and old Scots, which has the appearance of some weight in it, says no more for the one side of the question, than for the other. If it be urged, as is always done, that our oldest chronicles all concur in bringing the Scots out of Ireland, it should be remembered, that thele fame chronicles give the ridiculous story of Gathelus and Scota, with all that train of incoherent nonfense which latter ages have discarded. Why then should their authority be more facred in one part, than in another? But it will be faid, that the most antient writers extant speak of Ireland, as being the country of the Scots, and Archbishop Usher is positive that the present Scotland was never called by that name for some hundred years after Christ. But what authority, we might ask, have they for this affertion? Do any of the old Roman writers speak of the Scots in Ireland? They frequently mention them in Britain, and as making no little figure in that country: but of their connection with Ireland they fay nothing. Indeed Ireland was little known to the Romans: their LETTER arms never penetrated into it. And Camden la. ments it as a misfortune to Ireland, that the Roman government had not civilized it. There is a passage in the poet Claudian's panegyric on the 4th consulate of the Emperor Honorius, much laid hold of by the favourers of the Irish claim, in which the poet brings in "the frosty Ierne bewailing the " heaps of the flaughtered Scots": " Which, fay these writers, is a clear proof of Ireland being the mother-country of the Scots. But the late ingeni-See his Dif- ous Mr Walter Goodall has gone a great way, if fertation, not to demonstrate, at least to make it highly pro-&c. bable, that the lerne, or Juverna of the antients did not, and could not fignify the present Ireland, but by their description of it, must have meant the northern parts of what is now called Scotland. And if we are to reason from probability in an affair of this nature, there is, it not more, yet fully as much to be faid for the supposition of the Scots going out of Britain into Ireland, as for their coming out of Ireland into Britain. For if Britain was originally peopled from the opposite continent of

" Quid rigor æternus cœli, quid sidera prosunt?
 " Ignotumque fretum? maduerunt Saxone suso
 " Orcades: Incaluit Pictorum sanguine Thule;

" Scattorum cumulos flevit glacialis Ierne.
"But Claudian," a: an ingenious writer observes, "indulged

" all the wantonness of a poetical fancy in this panegyric. It was the poet's imagination only, that warmed Thule with Pictish blood, moistened the sands of Orkney with Saxon gore, and thawed the frozen Ierne into tears, for the slaughter of the Scots." M'Pherson's introduction to the history of Great Britain and Ireland, p. 115. "It is idle, he adds, to search for fact in the hyperboles of poetry. Latinus Pacatius, tho' a panegyrist likewise on the same subject, says no more than the Scot was driven back to his native fem. Re-

" dactum in paludes suas Scottum." Latin. Pacat. in Panegyr. Theodos

Gaul,

Gaul, as is generally admitted, and is most consoner LETTER nant to the scheme of peopling the earth countenanced by revelation, it may naturally be supposed that after the new colonies had explored and spread over the whole of this island, they would from some motive or other, be induced to try a passage over the narrow sea between them and Ireland, and gradually, at different times, and in different numbers, make settlements in that island next. This is surely more likely, than that the first planters of Ireland should have come from Spain, through the dangerous and tempestuous Bay of Biscay, which is so formidable to our navigators, even at this

It is truly furprising to find even such writers as reject the story of Gathelus and Scota, and seem inclined to derive the pedigree of the Scots, either from the Scythians, or the Celtæ (whom the Abbé Pezron shews to have been the founders of most of the western nations of Europe) yet all agreeing in the strange idea of carrying these old progenitors, whether Scyths or Celts, by a tedious kind of perambulation, first into Spain, then to Ireland, and at last into the northern parts of Britain. Thus Buchanan, when he speaks of " colonies going Rer. Scot. " from Gaul to Ireland," carries them first to. Spain, and then affigns fome plaufible reasons for their migrating to Ireland—as if the fame reasons might not as naturally have led them first to Ireland, either directly by navigation, or through the adjacent lands of Britain. So Camden, in tracing Camd. the Scots from the Scythians, is at no small pains to find Scythians in Spain; because, says he, "the " Scots will not be pleafed, unless they be brought " out of Spain into Ireland." While at the fame time, in accounting for the original of the other LETTER inhabitants of North Britain, the Picts, fuch writers make no scruple to land them directly out of Scythia, either upon the coast of Ireland with Bede. or in the north of Britain with Buchanan. why might not the Scots have been brought over in the same way? I see nothing to hinder it, but the impression made on the minds of our historians, by the old exploded notion of giving the Scots a Spanish original, and obliging them to come by Ireland to the possession of their own country. It is probably owing to some prejudice of the same kind, that those who reject the fabulous antiquities of Ireland, and produce unquestionable authorities for fo doing, yet are willing to believe the Irish, as far back as they believe any thing concerning them. to have been one people, of one language, under one fovereign, and one form of government, while at the same time, the southern parts of Britain, about which we are much better informed, were broken into jarring interests, among various tribes, and under contending leaders. We have reason to suppose that the case was the same in Ireland. fince as far down as St. Patrick's time, which was more than four hundred years after Christ, there were feveral Princes, or Kings, in that country. independent of, and warring with, one another, fome of them friendly to, and fome of them oppoling the Saint, in his great work of converting the people.

From this and fundry other circumstances, I think it may reasonably be inferred, that the Irish in general had not been originally of one stock, or at one time settled in their country, but had come over from the nearest lands of Britain, at different times, and on different occasions. There seems to have been long a close correspondence, as if arising from confanguinity, between the inhabitants of the LETTER north of Ireland, now called Uliter, and those of the opposite coasts of Scotland: And it is well known that any remarkable intelligence we have of the transactions of the old Scots is taken out of the Annals of Ulster, written partly in Irish, partly in Latin characters, and continuing from the year 444 to 1041. The chieftain or King of the British Scots appears also to have retained a sovereignty over the Ulster colony, and to have been Rex Scotorum, King of the Scots (the well known title of our monarchs) in both islands, as Camden tells us of a Divitiacus, who was King of the Belgæ, Brittan both in Gaul and Britain, and lived before Cæfar. Buchanan fays expresly of the first Fergus, that he Rex. Seek. went over to Ireland to quell an infurrection Lib. IV. " there, by bis authority, and was drowned off " Knockfergus," now called Carrickfergus in Ul-And still more to the point, the Archdeacon of Carlisle, in his Scottish Historical Library, C. vii. quotes Bishop Leslie's History, bearing that "when P. 246. Henry VIII. took upon him the title of King of "Ireland, it was much grumbled at by James V. who thought himself injured and encroached " on, fince for many ages the Northern parts of " that kingdom had been possessed by Scots, who 46 had ever owned themselves subjects of the Scot-66 tish Kings." Yea even Mr. Thomas Innes him-Crit. Effey self, who after Archbishop Usher has laboured p. 516-517. most strenuously to curtail the Scottish antiquities, acknowledges that the Scots had come in upon the old inhabitants of Ireland, and subdued them, as the Franks did to the Gauls, of which superiority he produces fundry instances. And these indeed plainly shew that the Scots were the masters, but do not prove from what part of the

rom

I. It world they came; though it is much more likely that fuch inroads were made from the nearest coasts of Britain, than from the distant countries of Scythia or Spain.

But be this as it may, it is enough for our honour, if there be any honour in these things, that the Scots are confessedly an old nation, and have long made a figure in Europe, both as men and Though we are certain, they are as christians. descended from some one of the three sons of Noah, yet we suspect there is not a people in Europe, that can affuredly trace their descent, thro' all the intermediate revolutions of time, from the dispersion at Babel down to the present æra. why should the Irish, whether they be our progenitors or not, pretend to this fingular privilege, or the Scots give themselves much trouble, either to confirm or confute it? We have histories and chronicles of our antiquities as well as other nations have, and do boast of as early and long a flanding, as any of them can pretend to, unless we except these our supposititious ancestors, of whom fuch romantic stories are told. I am not to examine as yet what use has been made of these relations, nor what designs some of our historians might have had in attempting to go fo far back into the regions of fiction, as to lofe all fight of authenticity. I shall only at present express my regrethat they have gone fo far on such slight grounds and endeavoured to build fuch a specious struc ture, without a more folid foundation to rest up For however much fuch airy fabrics mighhave fuited the public tafte some centuries ago and answered the ends they were then intended to ferve, the enlightened age in which we live is no fo submissively credulous, nor so very ready to yiek yield affent, but to fomething that looks like evidence.

I am, yours, &c.

LETTER II.

Confused State of our earliest Scottish History—— Uncertain Account of our first Conversion to Christianity, as given by Fordun——Enlarged on by Boece and others——Characters and Inconsistencies of these Writers.

N examining the feveral accounts of that early LETTER and obscure period of the Scottish history, to which we are now looking back, I find one strange defect running through the whole of them, which disappoints me not a little, and prevents the cordial reception which I might otherwise be inclined to give them. I fee an established monarchy, and fomething like a hereditary fuccession of Kings, as continued from a Fergus fon of Ferchard, to a Fergus, fon of Erch, for more than seven hundred years. Under this government, I fee a warlike and well regulated people, distinguished into Nobles and Plebeians, and transacting matters of state in as shrewd a way, and to as good purpose, as any of the present kingdoms or republics of Europe: Yet all the while I am not told where this people dwelt, in what place these Kings kept their court, what were the bounds of their kingdom, what terri-

LETTER tories they possessed, and such other localities as it is impossible to read any real history with plea-Jure, without having some idea of. In romances indeed, or fairy tales, we do not expect such minute details; since the design neither requires nor admitts them.

I can amuse myself with Ulysses and Circe, or with Telemachus and Calypso, without ever thinking about the geography of Circe's cave, or Calypso's But when I take up the Grecian or Roman histories, in the belief of the truth and reality of them, I immediately turn my thoughts to the respective scenes of every transaction, and can follow the historian thro' Greece and Italy, to Athens or Sparta, to Rome or Carthage, with some fort of order and precision. This I take to be an inseparable attendant on historical reading; and the want of it in our early history, as begun by Boece, and copied by Buchanan, is to me a great stumblingblock in the way of giving absolute credit to the otherwise well-told stories with which they have entertained us. On the other hand, I am not altogether fatisfied with another class of differtators, (for they have not as yet assumed the title of historians) who date the commencement of our monarchy from Fergus, fon of Erch, some centuries after Christ, and attempt to give us some kind of account where and in what places of the island his kingdom lav. but have not told us who were the inhabitants of these places before, or whether they were waste when he and his people took possession of them. Such and fo many, in a word, are the perplexities that occur in the way of unprejudiced inquiry into our antiquities, owing either to inaccuracy, or to a want of proper materials to go to work with, that one is at a loss how to behave, so as neither to be thought foolishly foolishly credulous on the one hand, nor obstinately LETTER sceptical on the other.

Yet, from a general view of the several criticisms, and collections drawn from the Roman writers and others, this much may with great certainty be gathered, that the part of Britain from the River Tweed to the northern extremity of it, which has for 900 years and upwards been called Scotland. was, before that time, as far back as we know any thing either certain or fabulous about it, of a different form from what it now exhibits, and parcelled out among various tribes of people, from whatever stock or country they had come into it. meet with the Picts in it as early and in as great repute as the Scots; we find them, fometimes separately, fometimes in conjunction with the Scots, incroaching upon and harraffing the provinces which the Romans had subdued in the southern parts. We read of walls which the Romans were obliged to raife, for fecuring their conquests from these brave affertors of liberty and independence, fometimes as far north as between the friths of Forth and Clyde, when the Roman arms were fuccessful; at other times, when fortune did not favour them, between Carlisle and the river Tync, what lay to the north being left to the possession of the northern tribes. Hence it happened, that the countries which lay between these two Roman walls were for a long tract of time in a very unfettled itate; and tho' now, and for many years back, they have been the richest and most fertile parts of Scotland, as having Edinburgh the metropolis of the kingdom, and the flourishing city of Glasgow within their limits, yet they were long in a most miserable condition, as being still the seat of war and devastation between their Roman masters and Calcdonian.

LETTER Calcdonian enemies, and therefore have been called, and very properly, by fome late writers, the " debateable lands," possessed by a people whom the Roman historian Dio calls Maata. In this fluctuating situation these continued all the time of the Roman power: and when on the decline of that unwieldy empire, the Saxons had got footing in Britain, the old contention was still kept up. 'last the fugitive Britons forced a kind of settlement to themselves along the western coast, from the Solway Frith towards Alcluit, now Dumbarton, which subsisted for some time, till, partly by conquest, partly by agreement, it fell under the Pictish voke, and from that, upon the union of the Pictish and Scottish monarchies in the person of Kenneth Macalpin, came to be a part of what is called Scotland, by the name of Galloway, as the eastern division, after many struggles between the Picts and the Saxons, did at the fame time and in the same way, by the name of Lodonesia or Lothian.

This is the only view we can form of our country of Scotland for some hundreds of years, and all that can, with any appearance of certainty, be collected out of the many various, and sometimes opposite relations which we meet with of these times in the Roman, Saxon, or British writers. I own it is but a confused view at best: But we must take it as we find it: for these were confused times in general, and our country was not fingular. fouth part of Britain was in no better state, either under the Roman Emperors or Saxon usurpers: And tho' for some short space after the full settlement of the Roman government in it under the Emperor Severus, till towards the decay of their grandeur in the time of Honorius, which cannot be reckoned at much above 200 years, that coun-LETTER try now called England, enjoyed some kind of rest, II. and was in some measure refined and cultivated by the Roman polity, yet even there and then there is not that clearness and regularity of history to be found, which gives satisfaction to the inquisitive and impartial mind.

Now when we find our civil history involved in fuch a cloud of darkness and uncertainty, what can be expected of perspicuity and order about ecclesiastical matters? Yet our historians affect to be as precise and distinct about our conversion to Christianity, and their accounts of that remarkable event are as implicitly received by fome, and as peremptorily accommodated to fome particular scheme by others, as if every thing about it was plain and clear, and undeniably attested by the most certain and irrefragable evidence. Let us take a view of the modern accounts of those early times, and fee how far, by the common rules of examination, they can bear the test of a candid and ferious ferutiny. I call them modern accounts: For we have none extant that can be called antient. And one should think this might raise some suspicion at the very entrance, especially in a point of fuch pretended antiquity and acknowledged importance.

The first historical intelligence of our original conversion we owe to John Fordun, a Priest of the diocese of St. Andrews, and Chaplain of the church of Aberdeen, who lived in the time of the Kings Robert II. and III. and compiled the history of the Scots in five books, bringing it down to the death of King David I. in 1153; which, with continuations by other hands to the death of James L in 1437, is commonly known by the title

D 2

LETTER of Scoticbronicon, or The Scots Chronicle. Now all he fays on the subject is, that, "in the 7th " year of the Emperor Severus, Victor, the first Scotichr. " of the name, and fourteenth after St. Peter, an Lib. ii. " African, and fon of one Felix, fat in the Papal cap. 40. " chair ten years, two months and twelve days: "Under him the Scots received the christian faith " in the year of our Lord 203." He then gives us the well known verses which he fays were current in his day,

> Christi transactis tribus annis atque ducentis. Scotia catholicam capit habere fidem;

as agreeing with the above account, but enters no further into particulars. Yet we are told of this fame historian, "that in order to qualify himself Crit. Essay " for his design, he spared neither labour nor dili-" gence, but travelled over all Scotland, fearthing " every where the libraries, churches, monasteries, " colleges, universities, and towns, gathering to-" gether all the remains he could meet with to "his purpose, discoursing also with learned men "that were versed in history, and not content " with that, it is faid he travelled into England " and Ireland upon the fame fearch, fetting down " carefully the informations he received, as ma-" terials for what he intended," Notwithstanding all which, we find his account of these old times very lame and imperfect: No mention of what the

Scotichr. Lib. iii. cap a.

p. 204.

28

except three or four of them: Yea he plainly owns, " that from the first Fergus son of Ferchard to Fer-" gus son of Erch inclusive, forty five kings of the " fame nation and stock had reigned in this island, " but he could not at prefent fay much about them, " for he had found nothing fully concerning "them." Accordingly what he gives us of the first forty Kings did, not so much as their names, first reception of the Christian saith is very general, only specifying the year and the name of the then Pope, but mentioning nothing of the Pope's having any hand in it, or giving any orders about it: Agreeably to what he says afterwards, Scotichr. Lib. iii.

"For, as we said before, Scotland received the cap. 8.

saith anno 203, præsidente Papa Victore primo, when Victor the first was Pope, but it was afterwards enlarged and renewed by Palladius; "kc. Thus what he had sound of our early conversion does not go a great length, nor lay a great soundation for much to be believed or said about it. But we shall soon see it enlarged upon, and wrought up into a more showy and conspicuous form.

About one hundred and forty years after Fordun, came out Hector Boece's history of Scotland, in the year 1526: He was born in Dundee, and after having commenced Master of Arts in the university of Paris in 1494, was made Canon of Aberdeen, and Principal of the university which the good Bishop Elphinston had lately founded in Old Aberdeen, his Episcopal seat. Now in this histo-Boece tells us, "Under the reign of Severus, Don-Boeth, His." ald king of the Scots by his ambassadors ob-

† What intelligence he had got about Pope Victor feems to have been but fallacious, as he makes him present at a council held at Cæsarea in Palestine about Easter, along with Theophilus of Cæsarea, and Narcissus the Patriarch, as he calls him, of Jerusalem, which is not likely, and differs from Eusebius, who says that at that time A. 196, Victor held a council at Rome. By the bye, this mistake of Fordun's, as it certainly is a mistake, lets us see that in his day it was not thought strange for a Pope to attend at even Provincial councils in the Eastern church, and that too without any particular degree of pre-eminence, for he only says that Victor "intersuit" was present, not "præsuit" presided in the council.

tained

LETTER " tained from Pope Victor, that learned and religi-" ous men should be sent into Scotland, to baptize " him, with his wife and children: The Scottish no-" bility followed the King's example, renounced " their old infidelity, and embracing the religion of " Christ, were washed in the holy laver: This was " done in the year of Christ 203, from the crea-"tion of the world 5399, and 533 from the be-" ginning of the Scottish kingdom." Here we have Fordun's short hint improved upon and swelled out into a larger fize: But as yet we know nothing of the persons employed in this great work, what character they had, or what were their This was an addition which Boece, it feems, would not venture upon: But about a hundred years after, the Popish Biographer Dempster our countryman had more courage, and expressly fays, that "Fordun was of opinion that one Paf-Prim. Brit. 66 chasius a Sicilian, at the command of Pope Vic-Eccl. " tor, first preached the Christian faith in Scotcap. 15. " land, and converted such vast numbers, that " there were scarce enough of Priests to bap-" tize the people: And that Paschasius leaving his " companions in Scotland to continue the work, " returned to Rome, and in King Donald's name " thanked the Pope for the great favour he had "done them: All which he found in an old book " of the church of Lismore, which was reckoned " the metropolis of all the Scottish churches." It is true this tale of Dempster's is not much laid hold of, as the man's character was none of the most Nich. Scot. creditable, being one of whom it is faid that "he Hist. Libr. 66 was as well inclined to believe a lie as any man p. 308. in his time, and as well qualified to put it into a 66 pretty dress." I only mention it to shew by what steps it is possible to go on with a story, and make

what

what we please out of any thing. We have seen LETTER Fordun only naming the Pope in whose time the conversion was begun: But Boece goes a step further, and particularizes the King who applied to the Pope for it, which Fordun had not done, and by his own account could not do. So Boece must have all the glory of this important discovery: And if it were not that a mighty stress has been laid upon it, and conclusions drawn from it to ferve the ends of a party, which I believe Boece never had in his eye, it might be past over like many other historical flourishes, without taking much notice of it. But when this bare affertion is built up into a regular system, and comparisons with after times stated and invidiously enlarged upon, it is proper and pertinent to enquire into it, and fee what kind of foundation it has to rest upon.

I do not charge Boece with having been the inventor of it. I take him to have been a good man in the main, but very credulous and easy to be imposed upon by people of cunning and design: And there might have been design in the inven-The competition for honour tion of this story. and antiquity might have started the thought of an embassy from a Scottish Donald to Pope Victor, to balance the English boast of a correspondence between a British Lucius and Pope Eleutherius, as readily as it had produced the fancy of Scota and Gathelus to boast of against the British Brutus and his companions, the one of these stories for the dignity of the church, the other for that of the flate. These ages were fertile in tricks of this kind: As may be feen in the processes before the Popes between Edward I. of England and the Estates of Sotland, about his claim of fuperiority over this kingdom, and in the contention at Constance in LETTER 1417, between the Orators of England and France. and at Basil in 1434 between those of Spain and England, about the pre-eminence of their respective churches; in all which cases there are produced on both fides fuch poor, pitiful arguments from traditionary or forged legends, and these too pled upon, and questions decided by them with the greatest gravity, that the present age would be ashamed of such a procedure. It is not improbable that this might have been the case here, and Boece been only the publisher of a plausible tale made ready by some means or other to his hand: And from what he has discovered of himself in his history, he feems to have had a pleasure in amplifying and expatiating upon, whatever he found or thought remarkable in other writers. Of this I Boeth. His. shall only adduce two instances: In his relation Lib. 9. of the mission from the monastery of Hy to convert the Northumbrians, tho' he positively says he follows Bede as his only guide in that affair, yet he puts a speech into Aidan's mouth on that occafion of the length of twenty fix long lines, which Bede had comprehended in fix very short ones. So much did the man love to magnify what he met with, and to seize every opportunity of displaying his speech-making talent. But the other instance is still more remarkable. In the account Bed Lib. i. which Bede gives of the dispute which the two cap. 17. Gallican Bishops Germanus and Lupus had with the Pelagians in Britain, and of the victory they gained over them, he concludes the narration in the very words of Constantius of Lyons, an older writer, who wrote the life of Germanus, thus, "The Ufher Pri.

"vanity of the Pelagians was convicted, their perfidy confuted, fo that, by their not being able to answer the opposite arguments, they ac-acknowledged their guilt; and the people that LETTER " were present could scarcely keep off their hands, " but they all testified their judgment of the con-"test by their shouting." Now Boece, in handling this affair, makes a flaming addition to this conclusion; "the debate, he fays, between the Pe-Boeth, Hild " lagians and the Orthodox continued many days, Lib. 8. "but when the Pelagians could not resist, and "the company judged their cause lost, such of "them as would not retract their opinions, were " delivered over to the Magistrates, and burnt: " And the rest being put to penance by the au-"thority of the Prelates, were received into fa-"vour." The burning of Heretics had not been in practice when Constantius and Bede wrote: But in Boece's day it was become familiar, and he would think himself warranted to use the expres-This shews his humour of complying with, and fashioning his narration to, his own times, which is a character given him not only by the Protestant Archdeacon of Carlisle, but even by one Nich. Scot. of his own communion, Mr. Thomas Innes, upon p. 106-114. the fcore of principle with respect to state mat-Crit. Essay

Here too I cannot but observe, that however favourable this story of Pope Victor may feem to the Popish cause, I do not find the writers on that side so fond of it as might have been expected, and as some of another party would make us believe they are. For the great annalist Baronius, tho' he admits the story of Lucius and Eleutherius, which indeed there is some more ground for, rejects our story as not being mentioned by Marianus, nor Bede, nor St. Jerome: And their ecclesiastical historian the Abbe Fleury takes not the least notice of it, in his accounts either of Vic-

II. Lucius and Eleutherius: And when fuch eminent writers on that fide shew it so little respect, we need not much mind what use others of less note need not much mind what use others of less note may make of it. But I cannot help being surprised at the way in which some of the Protestant writers handle it. Buchanan indeed is modest enough about it; All he says on the subject

Buch Hist is, that "Donald was the first of the Scottish I.ib. 4 in "Kings who embraced the Christian rites, tho"

"neither he nor his next successors, even with the affistance of a great part of the nobility, could quite abolish the old idolatry." He was too discerning to put up with Boece's story of Victor, but he could not, for reasons of his own, part with that of Donald; and he no doubt found it for the purpose he had in view at the time of his writing, tomake a christian of him. But I do wonder that such historians as Archbishop Spotswood and others, who reject the application to Victor, because of a little chronological mistake of six years, and some other apparent incongruities which could easily be removed, should yet admit the conversion of K. Donald, and all the consequences of it. I do not think that this is quite fair, to admit one part of a man's story and reject another, when we have no authority, but that man's testimony for either. For I ask, what authority there is for this story of K. Donald's conversion? And if it shall be answered, which indeed is all the answer that can be given, that honest Hector Boece has said so, it immediately occurs that Boece founds it upon the application to the Pope; and why not receive the one part of the honest man's story as well as the other? Certainly equity requires this:

And if the improbabilities which arise from the time and character of Victor tend only to shew LETTER that Boece, or his authors might have been mistaken: Why not allow a possibility of mistake in the other part too, and reject Donald as well as the Pope? That there was such a Pope, we are fure from unquestionable documents: Fordun had mentioned him before Boece, and many a creditable writer before Fordun: But the existence of K. Donald is, for ought we have feen to the contrary, altogether Boece's own production, and the great chasm of thirteen hundred years between the fact and the historian, without any interveening document that we know of to originate or support it, is but an unfavourable circumstance for the story in any part of it. Boece does indeed amuse us with a Veremundus, as the fountain of all his ancient intelligence, whom, he fays, he rather chuses to follow in his account of these old times than Geoffry of Monmouth, which indeed is no great compliment to his author's veracity, nor to his own judgment, as that Geoffry is justly reckoned the most fabulous of all the British writers. But this does not remove the difficulty: For even this Veremundus, if ever there was fuch a man, as being it is faid, Archdeacon of St. Andrews in the year 1076, eight hundred years and more after Donald and Victor, is by far too young a voucher for an affair of such consequence.— Neither have we any certainty but Boece's own word, for the contents of this history of Veremundus: And the fuspicions which himself has raised in people's minds of his inclination to invent, and to magnify what relates to his country at the expence of truth, do not leave us at liberty to trust his word implicitly, or believe him to be always a fair transcriber in things of any mo-

LETTER moment. Had the writings of this Veremundus been still remaining, people would have been able to judge what value they were of: But except David Chambers of Ormond, who was a Lord of Session in Q. Mary's time, and says he saw this history of Veremundus, we have never heard of its ever being feen by any other person: So that, after all this gentleman's testimony, there is perhape Crit. Essay not so great a mistake as Mr. Innes thinks, in p. 296. what the learned Gordon of Straloch favs he heard Nich. scot, when he was a young man at Aberdeen, "that Hift. Libr. "Boece had destroyed the copies of all the au-"thors he made use of, to make his own his-" tory the more valuable, and the only document " for all our antiquities." Nor is this all: For, allowing that Veremundus had faid all that Boece makes him fay on this head, it would feem that his account had not been much known or much regarded afterwards. For in the dispute about the crown between Bruce and Baliol, two hundred years and more after Veremundus, we find the barons of Scotland, in their instructions to their Commissioners at Rome, attributing their original Scotichr. conversion to the relicks of St. Andrew.

Lib. xi. Cap. 51.

which is more to the purpose, we find the then Pope Boniface VIII, who could not be ignorant of a transaction so glorious to his See, and was not the man to have parted with it, if he had known it, in a formal Bull emitted by him on that dispute in 1299, putting the King of England in mind, "that the kingdom of Scotland " was acquired and converted to the unity of the "Catholic faith by the venerable relicks of the " Apostle St. Andrew, not without the great gift. of the supreme Being." Which, by the by, whatever credibility may be in it, or application

Ufher Pri-Eccl. Br. FP 15.

of it to the Scots, did not happen, by the con-LETTER fentient testimony of all that speak of it, till 150 II. years or so after the era assigned to Donald and Victor: And I only make use of it to shew how little Donald's conversion was then known to, or taken notice of by those who ought to have known it, and would have found it their interest to have taken notice of it, if it had been to be noticed.

If Fordun therefore, after all the travel he made thro' the kingdom in fearch of intelligence, and with all the opportunities and abilities he had for discoveries of this kind, could learn nothing of the first Christian King, not so much as his bare name, where had the valuable documents been lying hid, which Boece fays were fent to him from Icolmkill, and it feems had escaped the laborious Fordun? Fordun indeed had lighted on fome verses that spoke of a Pope Victor I. and of England's beginning to embrace the Catholic faith in his time: And he had ingrafted the intelligence in the very fame terms into his history, as it was usual in those days to date any event that concerned religion from the years of the Popes. This was all the intelligence that was extant in Fordun's time, and though not made much use of by him, feems to have been all the foundation that Boece fought to build upon, and where, after all that he could make out of the particular year and Pope, he was obliged to coin a King of his own to complete the fabric. For hitherto he had met with no fuch name, not in any of the traditional genealogies of the old Shannachies; not in Fordun's history, which, tho' he had it in his posfession, he never once mentions; not in the history which he himself says, B. Elphinston wrote, and which he proposes to follow, nor in the bre-

LETTER viary of Aberdeen, drawn up and printed by t Bishop's order in 1509; in none of all which there a word of a King Donald, or any this Crit. Essay, looking that way. And if so, what becomes all the subsequent plans that we meet with church affairs in Boece and his followers, such Boeth hist King Crathilinth's ejecting the Druids out lib. 6.
Buch. hist. Mann, and planting christian clergy in th lib. 4. in room, and the like? And what stress can be l reg. 34. upon the accounts of church-government given in consequence of such an unsupported hypot fis by fome of our profest historians, that " " these old times the Scots were instructed in " faith by Priests and Monks without Bishops But of this more afterwards: Mean time,

I am, &c.

LF

Camd.Brit. * Boece takes Mann to have been their feat, because Tac in Insulis. had faid the Druids had resided in Mona, which is not Ma but the Welch is Land of Anglescy.

LETTER III.

Mission and Coming of Palladius——A Passage of Prosper relating to it——Another of Fordun—both properly explained—Story of the Expulsion and Restoration of the Scots considered—Probable Account of their Conversion to Christianity, and of all that Palladius did among them.

Have already observed, that the conversion of LETTER K. Donald, which now makes such a figure in our ecclefiaftical annals, might have been allowed to pass in the lump, with many more of Boece's historical peculiarities, if it had not been so strangely improved upon, and fwelled out to fuch a monfrous fize, with deductions and declamatory invectives from it. But when fuch a handle is made of a flory fo doubtful and ill founded, we are not to admit it blindly without some fort of exa-And indeed a very fuperficial examination, such as I have given it, is sufficient to discover the weakness of its foundation, and to satisfy every impartial person what a tottering fabric it must be that has no better ground to stand The history of our first forty Kings with K. Donald among them, as currently received, is the fource of a great part of that clamour and

LETTER confusion which has infested both our church and state in latter times: And tho' I shall not say that the first broachers of that history, either Fordun who threw out the hint, or Boece who enlarged upon it, had fuch a defign in view, (tho' it cannot be denied that Boece looks too much that way;) yet there is reason to suspect that Buchanan and his admirers have greedily embraced it, as so very capable of answering their great purpose of humbling Kings as well as Bishops: Nor can I help thinking that the elegance and fluency of Buchanan's Latin has contributed, and still contributes more to the favourable reception of these unauthenticated relations, than any strength or folidity that people would find in them, if it were not for that prejudice. So ready are we to be run away with by mere found; and a well told tale fet off in flowing language shall catch our esteem, and even steal our assent, without inquiring much either into the truth or fense of it. Thus in the present case we are pleased with the very found of fuch a long race of Kings as high up as Alexander the Great, and are fond to hear of a church planted among us with fuch harmony and regularity in almost the very earliest times of christianity: And when we read all this in the well turned periods of a Buchanan, purged from the many apparent fabulofities of a Boece, which he had artfully taken care to retrench, we easily and unthinkingly fwallow all, without ever asking for authorities, or troubling our heads with any ill-looking confequences. But I shall not prosecute this confideration further at this time. shall have occasion to bring it in more properly afterwards, and shall now step forward to an era of fomewhat more certainty, and which prefents to us another another noticeable event in our ecclesiastical annals: And that is the coming of Palladius among III. us in the year 430, to the same purpose and from the same quarter with the nameless persons who are said to have come two hundred and twenty seven years before.

I call this an era of more certainty, as we have the first accounts of it from a writer who lived at the time when, and in the place whence Palladius was fent: The passage is well known in the Chronicon of Prosper Aquitanus, where we read, that " Palladius being ordained by Pope Celestine, is " fent the first Bishop to the Scots believing in "Christ." This is a much made-of discovery, and is still quoted by ecclesiastical writers of every age and every nation. So there is not the least ground to doubt the authenticity of it, and if there had been but half as much evidence for the other ftory of Donald and Victor, I should not have made the least objection to the authenticity of it. Yet with all this concurrence of authority for the mission of Palladius, it is surprising to see what a handle has been made of it by some, and what a dust has been raised about it by others. own writers, Fordun, Major, Boece, Buchanan, &c. endeavour to infer from Prosper's calling Palladius the "first" Bishop, that before his time the Scottish church was governed, and the affairs of religion among them managed without Bishops. And it is well known how loudly the Presbyterian party have triumphed upon this inference, and do still attribute to Palladius the change of the old model, which they would make us believe was agreeable to their darling parity-scheme, into the tyranny, as they call it, of modern prelacy. if these gentlemen would look into things with might perhaps find cause to be somewhat less c fident in their allegations even from this favour T'her de Primord. lib. 16.

Ţ,

LETTER a little more attention and less prejudice. ti

occasion which Prosper and his commentators g them. I shall not insist on Archbishop Ush critical observation, that the in all the comp editions of Prosper's chronicle the Primus E copus, first Bishop, is still to be met with, yet in edition he made use of, as published by Duche in his first tome of French writers, it is only said,: Usher quotes it so, "Palladius Episcopus mittitu Palladius is fent a Bishop. This indeed wo knock down the doughty argument at once, : quite destroy any use that might be made of it. I shall take no advantage of this discovery, nor s to avail myself, as might be done, of the two co mon criticisms on the word "First," as if it mi fignify 1. not the first Bishop whom the Scots 1 had, but the first whom Pope Celestine, or Pope had fent to them, or 2. in another fer the primary Bishop, or Bishop of the first & These interpretations, I say, may be passed fr on the present occasion: And I shall admit expression in all its force, tho' I still deny the ference drawn from it.

But before I go further, I must stop a little · take notice of the partiality of some people, wi they have a cause to serve: Fordun had si that "before the incoming of Palladius, the Sc " had for teachers of the faith, and ministers " the facraments, Presbyters only, or Monks

Scotichron.

lib. iii.

cap. 8.

" lowing the rites of the primitive church." These are Fordun's words literally rendered, may well bear his meaning to have been, that Presbyters or Monks, in their administration of facraments followed the primitive rites, wh would fay nothing for or against Episcopacy. But LETTER the common acceptation put upon them by the III. parity-men, and which they squeeze out of the word "onl," and by inverting the connection, is, that it was in having only Prefbyters or Monks among them, that the Scots followed the rites of the primitive church. Now Fordun could not but know that the primitive church had Bishops, and therefore a distinction must be found out to fave his credit, and reconcile him to the proposed Accordingly Mr. David Buchanan, who in Charles the First's time published an edition in quarto of Knox's history, with a preface and interpolations, after quoting Fordun, gives us this findure of his own; "Mark the latter words, Preface, " for according to this faying goes the judgment p. 26. " of the best divines who write the truth with-"out any respect, whose mind John Semeca de-" clareth thus, in glossa decreti, In the first pri-" mitive church the office of Bishops and Priests was " common to one and the other, and the names " common, but in the fecond primitive church "the names and the offices began to be dif-"tinguished." Is it not furprifing to find a man of this writer's principles complimenting the gloffers upon the decretals with the title of "Best Di-"vines," and appealing to that corrupt farrago in a debate about the primitive church? When he could not but know what a fourious collection these decretals were, and how the two Popes, Innocent III. and his nephew Gregory IX. who authorised them, made use of them to invade the rights of the episcopate, and level all fort of ecdefiaftical distinction to the foot of the Papal But notwithstanding the application of this Popish argument to serve an anti-episcopal

F 2

III.

LETTER cause, it still remains to be shewn when that nice distinction between the two "primitives" began and that there were Monks, (for both Fordu and Major class them with Presbyters) in the church before Bishops. Let the opposers of Epi ... copacy try to folve either of these difficulties, and when they have made the attempt, they will see whether there be any ground for the inference which their approved writers think they find in Fordun, from all that Prosper says about the coning of Palladius.

And now that you may understand this affair the better, as far at least as it can be explained from the various accounts we have of this first Bishop of the Scots, I must take a survey of another remarkable epocha of our old history, whick whatever be my own opinion of it, may afford anexplanation of the passage in Prosper, that ought not to be rejected by those persons whom I have now in my eye. I have already observed that those of our historians, from whom the Presbyterians draw the above mentioned conclusions, do all go in general, tho' with fome few particular variations, upon the plan of a long succession of kings for more than feven hundred years, from a Fergus fon of Ferchard to a Fergus fon of Erch: And because they have seen in some old fragments of records fomething like an infinuation that a Fergus MacErch makes a greater figure in history than his old name-father, they have given us a distinct account of a dissolution of the old monarchy, and a restoration of it after a tract of some. years by this fecond Fergus, which opens up a new scene to us, and makes every thing clear and perspicuous. Even Fordun the first of them, tho' he owns he knew nothing particular or certain tain of these old times, yet is precise enough about LETTER the dissolution of the monarchy by Maximus the Roman Governor of Britain, and places it in the vear 360: Boece, in his confused way, brings it scotichron. down to 379: Major fixes it to 353: And Bu-lib. ii.c. 57. thanan to 377. But they all agree in telling i vi. us, that the King Eugenius was killed in battle De Geff. with most of his nobles, and a vast number of cap. 1. the common people; and that his brother Etho-Buch. Hist. dius or Ethach with his fon Erch, and fuch of lib. v. the people as escaped, fled, some to Ireland, some to Norway and other places of fafety, from the fury of their victorious enemies: That Erch's fon Fergus, when he came to man's estate, gathered together all, his countrymen from the various places of their dispersion, and once more resettled them in their old country. This restoration For-Scotichron. dun and Major place in 403, and Buchanan in lib. iii. c.t. 404: But Boece, to answer his notion of Fergus Buch. 1: v. being at the taking of Rome by Alaric the Goth in 409, and bringing books from thence to Iona, has it not sooner than 422. I am not as yet to Boet. I. vi. enquire into the truth of all this, but to take it as I find it, and to argue from the supposition of the reality of it, about the true meaning of Prosper in his account of the mission of Palladius. We have seen that this Fergus was born abroad, that by the oldest accounts the exile lasted forty years, in which time the most of the old refugees would be dead and gone, that the countries to which it is said they sled, whether Norway, Denmark or Ireland, were at that time heathen, consequently that at the time of their restoration there would be but little of church government, or of old clergy among them, whatever of that kind might have been in the kingdom before. So they would

LETTER be almost a new people with some little knowledge perhaps of Christianity, but no regular plan of facred ministrations: In a word, for some time at least after their return they would be in a confused, unfettled way both as to church and state. In which case, if Prosper knew these things, as it is probable he might if they were to be known, was it not proper and quite consonant to fact, to call a Bishop who was fent among such a people their "first" Bishop? Whether their forefathers before their expulsion had Bishops or not, it must be allowed they themselves had none. The famed college that Boece speaks of in the Isle of Mann would undergo the same catastrophe with the rest: And his story of the Monks of Iona or Hy labours under so many incongruities even upon his own scheme, that no judicious person would chuse to lay any weight upon it. From all which I think there is no reason to wrest this affair of Palladius so much as has been done, nor do I see what connection there is between his being the first Bishop of the restored Scots, and the state of church matters among the people of that name so many years before. He was certainly the first Bishop designed for this new settlement, and Prosper might very pertinently call him so, without any respect either in intention or expression, to any model of church government that the progenitors of this people might have lived under. All this, I fay, may be argued upon the footing of our histories as they stand, and those who admit these histories, and draw conclusions of their own from them, cannot well refuse the force of this argumentation. But after all, I must own I have no faith to give to the whole of this story, as it stands, about the total expulsion, and wonderful restoration of the Scots. There are fo many anachron-LETTER isms and other contradictions in it, such a variety of confused and jarring relations concerning it, that one cannot well tell what to make of it.-Fordun, who first speaks of it, fixes the expulfron to the year 360: Tho' at that time, we are told by a cotemporary historian of good credit, Ammianus Marcellinus, that the Scots and Picts were ravaging the Roman provinces in Britain, and filling the provincials with terror; that in Ammian. 364 the Scots and Picts were continuing their 1. 26, 27. incursions, and that the territories of the empire were not fufficiently fortified against them till 368, when the general Theodosius, father to the first Emperor of that name, drove them back beyond the Northern wall, and erected all the countries between the two walls into a fifth province, by the name of Valentia. This is Ammian's account, who lived at the time, and consequently is a more credible narrator of Roman transactions than writers so very much later as Fordun or Boece. Buchanan had feen this glaring mistake, of antedating the expulsion by Maximus so many years before Maximus had any concern in the island, and therefore to make it coincide, as he thought, with Maximus's government, he brings it down to the year 377, and adopts, with fundry enlargements, the lamentable description that Fordun and Boece had given of it before. This indeed shews Buchanan to have been a nicer critic in chronological matters than the former two, but favs nothing for his authority any more than theirs. For after this year which Buchanan has fixed for their complete expulsion, we find from very old writers, such as the poet Claudian, Gregory of Tours, Tiro, Prosper, Gildas and Bede, that the Scots in con-

LETTER conjunction with the Picts were perpetually harraffing the poor subjects of the Roman provinces on both fides of the Southern wall, all the time Crit. Effay indeed of their alledged exile, and till the very p.652.663. date of what is called their restoration, whether in 403 or 422. I need not take notice of the many inconfistencies among our historians about this restoration, every one of them representing it fo as to fuit their own plan, without affigning their authorities, or giving any reason for their feveral accounts. It is enough for my purpose that we fee it plain, from the undoubted testimony of reputable writers, that there were Scots in Britain all the time affigned to their being scattered thro' foreign countries by our modern historians: So what shall we think of all that they tell us, and tell us fo precifely too, of these times? The only answer that can be given is, that later writers have had some particular end to serve, and the antients none.

In reply to all this, it will be faid perhaps that the Scots spoken of by Gildas, Bede, &c. as infesting the Roman provinces between the expulsion and restoration, were not settled inhabitants of Britain, but marauders from Ireland, who came over now and then for plunder, and fneaked home again as fast as they could with their booty. And for this, I know, there is the fuffrage of very respectable writers, fuch as Archbishop Usher, Dr. Stillingsleet. and fundry others. But with all due deference to Primate Usher, whose unwearied historical labours deserve admiration, I do not see what solid reafons he has for this opinion, of which he feems to have been the author, and in which he has had so many followers. Gildas, the most antient British writer we have, and who wrote about the year 530, had faid, that "when Maximus had LETTER " usurped the title of Emperor in 383, and was "killed at Aquileiz in 388, the Roman part of "Britain being destitute of Governors, and stript " of all military protection, was miserably ravag-"ed for many years by two fierce transmarine " nations, the Scots from one point of the com-" pass, which he calls Circius, and the Picts from "another, which he calls Aquilo." After him Bede, who finished his ecclesiastical history in 731, repeats the same account, and in the very fame words: Adding likewise, "We call these " nations transmarine, not that they dwelt out of "Britain, but because they were separated from " the country of the Britons, by two interjacent " friths of the sea, of which one from the East sea, " and the other from the West sea, break far into " the land of Britain, tho' they do not quite meet: "The East frith has in the middle of it the city "Guidi: The West one has upon it the city Al-" cluid, which in their language fignifies the rock " of Cluyd, for it is beside the river of that " name." He had said before, "There is a great "frith of the sea which of old divided the Bri-"tons from the Picts, and breaks far into the " land from the West, where there is a strong " city of the Britons to this day, called Alcluyd:

year

The Circius here, from which the Scots came, certainly figures the North-west, as Mr. Goodall has clearly evinced by grammatical authorities, so which may be added the consent of Fordun, who in his description of the cardinal winds, says, "the fecond point or cardinal wind is placed in the West, where "the sun sets at the autumnal equinox, and is called Favonius, who has two collateral winds, Circius towards the North, and Zephyrus towards the South;" and again, "Favonius has on his right hand the wind Circius or Cercius, which makes snows and hail."

G

III. "they came, fibi locum patrize fecerunt, fixed their refidence." From all which it is eviden that the Scots who came from Circius into the Roman provinces, came out of one part of Britain into another, and were no more foreigner from another country, than the Picts who came from Aquilo, the North or North-east, and joined with them in these inroads.

G'lds, cap. 19. Bed. lib.i.

urges, and his copiers from him, that where Gil das had faid, "Revertuntur impudentes graffato " res Hiberni domum, these impudent Irish plun "derers return home," Bede expresses it by "Re "vertuntur Scoti domum, the Scots return "home," from which he pleads that Bede call those Scots whom Gildas had called Irish, and confequently that these Scots were the inhabi tants of Ireland. But this still seems to be beg ging the question: For Bede's variation no more proves that the Scoti, Scots were inhabi tants of the island now called Ireland, than it does that the Hiberni, whom the primate will have to be Irish, were the inhabitants of that part of Britain now called Scotland. And if there be any ground for Mr. Goodal's notion of the Ierne of Hiberne of the antients being the part of Britair to the North or North-west of the Northern wall.

It is true, the learned Primate Usher further

† These firths of Forth and Clyde, as they are now called were called seas in the careless style of those days, and even as far down as the time of the Regiam Majestatem, where we reac that the amerciaments of the Justiciary Court, ex parte boreal maris Scotiæ, on the North side of the Scottish sea, were paid it cattle, and these ultra mare Scotiæ, sicut in Laudonia et inter a quas de Forth et Tyne, on the other side of the Scottish sea, as in Lothian and between the waters of Forth and Tyne, were paid in money.

Dr Mackerzie's Lives, v. i

i

it is highly probable that Gildas meant the people LETTER of these parts by Hiberni, who, he says, came from Circius in conjunction with the Picts from Mr. Innes has justly argued against Archbishop Usher's opinion from the improbability of fuch swarms of armed men every now and then croffing the rapid tides between Ireland and Britain in their currughs, or little boats as Gildas calls them, and returning back again every year, rather than staying in Britain with their allies the Picts, who it is acknowledged, Crit, Est.y, had their residence in Britain at that time. The p. 660. learned Sir George M'kenzie, who was King's advocate for Scotland in James the Seventh's time, had made the same observation before, in his dispute with the Bishop of St. Asaph upon this subjed: And an English author, the Archdeacon of Carlisle, afterwards Bishop of Londonderry, approves of Sir George's argumentation as strong and convincing, and carrying a great degree of se et. Itin. light in it. Upon the whole therefore, I think Libr. chink we may warrantably conclude that, as upon the P. 135. one hand there is no good ground for supposing an expulsion and restoration of the Scots, with our three famed historians, Fordun, Boece, and Buchanan, fo upon the other hand there is equally a little for imagining, with Archbishop Usher and his retinue, that the Scots spoken of at that time were not residenters in Britain, but the proper inhabitants of Ireland.

† Perhaps Gildas means no more by his Hiberni graffatores but a pack of robbers that stole out in winter, as it is well known the Latin word "Hiberni" is applicable to winter as well as to Ireland, and Mr. Goodall says there is a different reading to be met with in an old manuscript of Gildas published by Gale, "te-" ventuntur hibernas domos," which I would render, they return to their winter homes.

You will ask, what has all this to do with th LETTER affair of Palladius? And I answer, a great dea A number of able writers, but who feem to b too envious of any thing that looks like gloriou to the Scottish mation, would be robbing ou country of even the honour of Palladius. Irish claim his mission to their island, which is no much to be wondered at, confidering their nation al character: Yea, their great primate tells us 66 there are not wanting some who think that th "whole story of the old conversion under, or b " Pope Victor belongs to Ireland, which he fay " was the antient Scotland," and he quotes Bo zius to that purpose. But it is strange that th English should fall in with this piece of critic robbery, when it has no concern with any thin relative to their own antiquities, and at the fam time drives them into the unjustifiable method wresting texts, and even contradicting themselve Thus Mr. Collier in his ecclefiaftical history, speal ing of Palladius, fays, "he was confecrated l " Pope Celestine, and sent, as Prosper informs u Borlef hift. " ad Scotos in Christum credentes, that is, b. i. p. 50. " the converted Scots in Ireland," when ever one knows there is not the least word of Irelan in Prosper's text. So in another place, he sa " the time of the Scots first settling in this islan " is, by the learned Primate Usher, fixed to the 16bil. b. ii. 4 year of our Lord 503," and refers us to D P. 15. Stillingfleet's reply to the counter-evidence offer by Sir George M'kenzie. And yet afterward fpeaking of the irruptions of the Danes into En land, he feems to have forgot this: For he fay " after the Romans had made themselves maste " of Britain, the Scots and Picts, tho' they made " frequent incursions, yet it was only upon the " more northern and barren parts of the islan " wher

"where, being once feated, they were quiet for LETTER " a great while, and defifted from any further attempt: And as for the Saxons who came next upon the country, they were nothing so de-fiructive as the Danes." Here he plainly makes B. iii. The feating, or fettling of the Scots in Britain prior p. 153to the incoming of the Saxons, which is generalreckoned about the year 450, and confiderably before the era he had formerly assigned to that So much does the force of truth break out, when people have nothing immediately before them to warp them from it. Now as to Palladius, it is agreed on all hands that he was fent to the believing Scots: And it is admitted, because it cannot well be denied, that there were Scots in Britain seventy years before his mission. We have Ammian's testimony for this, and from the account he gives of them, as having such a hand in opposing the Roman power, and diffresfing their provinces, it may be concluded they had been no contemptible people for many years. Nor is it very natural to suppose that such troublesome memies would be still driving backward and forward across the sea between Ireland and Britain. all that long tract of time, out of hatred to the Romans, without ever attempting, or being able to obtain a footing on the fame continent with them, where they could with less danger and more fuccess annoy and harrass them. And as for their being believers when Palladius was fent to them. that may eafily be accounted for without going to far back as Donald and Victor, or having recourse to the Presbyters and Monks, whom Buchanan and his admirers make fuch a pother about. The christian faith had no doubt come early into Britain, tho' we cannot with clearness ascertain the LETTER the precise time or particular way. The zeal and fervour of these first ages, and I hope I may fay, the especial direction of a superintending providence, would produce this. Who were the particular persons, or what were the particular means by which this happy work was first begun, has not been clearly handed down to us. We have been told of Joseph of Arimathea, of an Aristobolus, of Simon Zelotes, of St. Paul, yea even of St. Peter himself being in Britain, and tho' we have not fufficient ground to give credit absolutely to these relations, there has nothing as yet appeared to disprove them altogether. There certainly were conversions in these early days, which the Bishops of Rome had no hand in, and knew nothing of. The Apostles themselves and their immediate disciples would be very active in propagating the gospel, and fulfilling the great com-, mission given them by their master. There has been an old current tradition that St. Thomas carried it as far as China: "Per D. Thomam evan-" gelium Christi ascendit et volavit ad Sinas; By "St. Thomas the gospel of Christ ascended and " flew to the Chinese." May it not be thought that Britain would be as early enlightened, which was of easier access, and to which a door had been opened, as if by a particular appointment of heaven, by Julius Cæsar, near one hundred years before? In general, it will be allowed that the progress of the Roman arms would pave a way for the spreading of the gospel far and near: The whole current of church-history, and the correfpondence of fuch authentic accounts as we have, lead to this presumption: and we may safely enough suppose, that numbers of the sacred character, Bishops as well as others, would, out of a voluntary zeal, and without fear of danger in LETTER fuch a good cause, take the opportunity of the marching of the Roman troops to the various parts of this western world of ours, and mix themselves even with such company, either openly or under disguise, for the accomplishment of such a falutary purpose. The Roman histories present us with two likely enough opportunities of this kind. One is, when the Emperor Claudius came over in person to Britain, in whose houshold we have St. Paul's attestation there were Saints: And again when Domitian fent over Julius Agricola, who staid many years in the country, and failed round the whole island with his fleet. At both which times it is supposable that there would be christians, and some even of the clergy, along with these expeditions. Many of the Bishops in these primitive times, and that there were Bishops then cannot be questioned, looked upon the whole world as, in a larger fense, their charge, and thought themselves called upon, as far as the necessities of their own particular portions of the flock would permit, to employ their labours where and when they found it convenient, in enlarging the church, and publishing the glad tidings of falvation. not infift upon the prevailing opinion adopted by fo many of our writers, that our ancestors owed their conversion to the disciples of St. John, because I do not think the argument, drawn from the difference of rites in after times, conclusive enough to establish such opinion. Yet I do not deny its being probable, that some of them, when they faw their master persecuted and banished by that favage tyrant Domitian, for which we have undoubted evidence, would disperse themselves different ways, and part of them step over to Britain

LETTER along with the Roman army: Though they would no doubt take some time from their first com over, to spread themselves, and carry their m strations to the various corners of the island whthey could find inhabitants.

Accordingly, about a hundred years after A cola's time, we find Tertullian looking this w= when he fays, in enumerating the many nation Judacos, where the gospel had been preached, "Brit= cap. 7. " norum loca Romanis inaccessa. Christo ve

> " fubdita, parts of Britain not reached to "the Romans, but subject to Christ." fome time after Tertullian, lived the famous Origen, who gives the same testimony of christia-

i6

Orig. Hom. nity being early carried into Britain. It is ceriv. in Ezek tain that long before the council of Nice there & vi.inLuc. was a church in Britain, and a church too, regularly fettled under, and governed, according to the ancient and primitive institution, by Bishops. For, in a fynod held at Arles under Constantine about the Donatist schism in 314, there assisted three British Bishops, Eborius of York, Restitutus of London, and Adelphius of a third place, fupposed to be Colchester, and along with them a Presbyter called Sacerdos, and Arminius a Dea. con. In the following councils of Nice, Sardica and Rimini, there were Bishops from Britain, as the ecclesiastical writers of these times do all testify. Now when we consider how ready the Bishops of these early ages were to diffuse the christian faith thro' the neighbouring nations by every possible means of access, and when, along with this confideration, we find that the people to the north of the Roman provinces in Britain, by whatever names they were then called, whether Scots, or Picts, or Caledonians, had frequent correspondence of some kind or other with the RO-LETTER. man subjects, we may hence infer with great probability, that fome degree of acquaintance would be formed with the christian faith among these morthern tribes? It needs not be objected that the correspondence I plead from was an hostile one: For even enemies will sometimes have friendly commerce with one another: And the calamitous intercourses of war have oft been the means of conveying the knowledge of the truth. It was a captive girl from Israel that brought the Syrian General Naaman to the knowledge of the true God: And the conversion of the Iberians, a numerous people between the Pont-Euxine and the Caspian sea, was owing to a christian woman whom they had taken prisoner in some of their incurfions into the lands of the empire. Might not the Fleur. hift. common chance of captives between the christian Eccles. liv. Britains and their northern enemies operate to xi. ch. 39. the same effect? I see nothing to hinder why it might not. Indeed we have two instances in fact which afford some shadow of proof for such a fupposition. One is of the old heretic Pelagius, who made a figure in the world a good many years before we hear of Palladius, and is by universal consent of writers called a Briton: Which fixes the place of his nativity in this island, and gives room to make a Scotsman of him, on the authority of his cotemporary St. Jerom, who frequently calls him Scotus, and in one place particularly adds "de Britannorum vicinia, from the " neighbourhood of the Britons." Here then Dr Mackis one believer among the Scots, and a notable enz. Lives, one too both for morals and learning, except in vol. i. that one article in which he grossly erred. The other instance is of the still more famous S. Pa-

Ufber de Prim. cap. 8.

trick.

H

LETTER trick, the Apostle as he is called, of Irelana whom, because all the writers of his life say

48

De Prim. Cap 17.

was born in Britain, Camden will have to a Welchman, tho' even Archbishop Usher prow from undoubted testimony that he was born ne Alcluid, now Dunbarton. Only the primate wnot allow him to have been a Scotsman, became on his plan the Scots had not only at that time no possession of that part of the country, but evwere not then in any part of Britain at all. E I have shewn already that, whatever truth the may be in the first part of the Primate's negation there certainly were Scots in the neighbourh of Dunbarton about the year 370, when Patrz was born, fince the Roman historians of these time speak of the Scots as then harassing the Ronprovinces, and coming over the northern wa for that purpole. It appears therefore that trick was born, if not among the Scots, yet in the next neighbourhood, and, as we might fay, their very door. His grandfather Politus was Presbyter, his father Calphurnius a Deacon, as his mother Conchessa either sister or niece to the celebrated St. Martin of Tours. christian connexions I think it may reasonably b inferred, that the Scots being in such a christia vicinity would, notwithstanding of their hosti incursions, and even by the means of these ver inroads, have the opportunity, and probably migh fome of them at least, embrace it, of becoming a quainted with that faith, to which they were a terwards so famous for their attachment. So muc you see is to be said for the historical charact given of them, that there were " credentes, belie " ers" among them when Palladius was fent them.

Inde

Indeed I needed not have been at the pains of LETTER all this deduction, but might have rested the whole of the question about Prosper's testimony of them on St. Paul's reasoning, Romans x. 14. "How shall they believe on him of whom they "have not heard? And how shall they hear with-"out a preacher? And how shall they preach ex-"cept they be fent?" Now there were believing Scots before Palladius: Consequently these belevers had heard of Christ. Christ had been preached to them, and preachers had been fent. By whom fent we cannot specify: The Apostle's reasoning does not require it. Certainly by such is had power and authority devolved from the original Sender. And if we are to look towards human mission, which, after the Apostolic times, was the ordinary, if not the only method of convevance, where shall we find a readier or more likely fource of mission than from the neighbouring churches of the Roman part of Britain and their respective Bishops, an Eborius of York for instance who was next to them, and may be thought to have had as easy a communication with them as with Arles in France. Yet this does not prove, nor even oblige us to suppose, that the Scots all this time had a regular organized church among them, or a fettled government sither by Bishops or Presbyters. Prosper's words maply no fuch thing: "Ad Scotos credentes in "Christum" may signify "to such of the Scots as believed in Christ," not that all the Scots were believers: So then all the fine things faid on his fubject by Boece, and hinted at by Buchanan, re faid wholly without book; and the posterior mprovements of latter times are no better than many alry fabrics without any folid founda-H 2

_ 4

Palladius is expressly said to have been LETTER tion. to the believing Scots: A cotemporary wr rays fo, and that writer calls him "primus E _ "copus," the first Bishop. Here is a cer uncontested fact: Let us therefore take anpartial view of it, and upon comparing the vous accounts we have concerning it, we shall there is not so much to be made of it as sc people imagine. Prosper says, he was sent by P Celestine, and the friends of the Pope may some stress upon this: But we are not told wtitle the Pope had to fend him, and we are ignorant how ready the Popes even then were be meddling in matters where, upon primi principles, they had no immediate concern. contention between Celestine's three predeces and the African Bishops, of whom the great Augustine was one, about the exercise of chur discipline upon some of their own members, is a proof of this. And the we give Prosper credit for the fact in general, yet we know that the man was fully as much attached to the Pope's honour as was confistent with truth and candour. We have an instance of this in the affair of the two Gallican Bishops, Germanus of Auxerre and Lupus of Troyes, coming over to recover the British churches from the infection of the Pelagian errors. Prosper attributes this entirely to Chron. ad Celestine, and says, "Pope Celestine sends the ann. 429. " Bishop Germanus, vice sua, in his own stead, " and driving out the Heretics, reduces the Bri-" tons to the Catholic faith." But another cotemporary writer, Constantius a Presbyter of Ly-Bed. lib. i. ons, who is followed by Bede and many others,

Bed. lib. i. ons, who is followed by Bede and many others, fays it was owing to the application of the British Bishops themselves to the Bishops of Gaul, who

in a fynod held for the purpose, deputed Ger-LETTER manus and Lupus for that work. And this difference of accounts appeared to material to the annalist Baronius, that, to reconcile them, he was obliged to suppose "that either the Pope " might have before hand devolved his power " of legation on the Gallican fynod, or given "his approbation afterwards to the delegates "his approbation afterwards to the delegation whom the fynod employed." It is not un-Baron. A. D. 429. likely that Prosper might have been as favour- p. 531, able, I shall not say, partial in this other case of Palladius. And if so, the Pope would have no more glory by the one than by the other. For the truth is, Prosper could not be intimately acquainted with the particular situation or progress of christianity among the Scots at that time.— He might have heard that there were such a people, and in Britain too, from the accounts which the Roman troops would bring over of their harassing the provinces there: And some distant hints might have been given him, that there was fomething like christianity among them. But what form of church-government was or could be among a people fo rough and uncivilized as the Scots then would appear to a Roman eye, he could not distinctly know: So that he might naturally suppose that any Bishop, who would venture among them, either by a mission from the Pope or by any other deputation, would. be the first of that character, whom such an untrained and unsettled sect of christians had been favoured with. I do not mean that this was actually the case, or that the Scots at this era were really so wild and irregular either as to church or state: But only, that, from the unfavourable idea which the Romans would have of them as

III. Britons, Prosper might, consistently enough w all that he could hear about them, look up them in no better light, and consequently mig write of Palladius and them in the lame w he does.

But, to pass over these things as conjectur though not improbable, it remains to be aske what this Palladius did among the Scots when came? This is the main question, and Prost fays nothing about it. It is from our own I torians that we have any answer to it, and th Scotichron are all full upon it. Fordun tells us that Pal lib. iii. c. dius came into Scotland in the eleventh year King Eugenius, "cum magna cleri comitiva," wi a great company of clergy, and that the King ga Lib. ij. him a habitation at Fordun in the Merns. cap. 4. Major fays, " Pope Celestine consecrates Palladi " a Bishop, and sends him to Scotland: For t "Scots had been instructed in the faith by Prie " and Monks, without Bishops: Palladius of "dains Servanus a Bishop, and sends him to t Boeth. His. " Orkneys," &c. Boece says, "he ordained Se Lib. 7. " vanus a Bishop, and sent him to the Orkney " and likewise made Tervanus, whom he h " baptized when a child, Archbishop of the Pic " being in all these good offices supported by t " piety and liberality of K. Dongard, who h ңы. lib.iii. * fucceeded Eugenius.'' Polydore Virgil, an En lish writer of that age, brings him down to t time of Constantine, who succeeded Dongar which is full thirty years from his coming over Buch. Hist. Buchanan says, "Palladius_was sent by Pope C Lib. v. in less the less to root out the remainders of the Pe. "gian heresy, under whose institution a great m

56 ny mencame to be famous for learning and h

" lines of life, the chief of whom" (he says, con-LETTER trary to both chronology and fact) "were Patri-"cius, Servanus, Ninianus, Kentigernus: This " Palladius is believed to have been the first who " made Bishops in Scotland: For before that " time," &c. His namefake David Buchanan enlarges, in conformity to his own principles, upon Preface to knoz, all this, and adds; "that when Palladius had p. 28, 29. "with small difficulty assisted the orthodox to " disabuse those who had been carried away by " Pelagianism, he in a short time by subtile in-" finuations gained fo far on the well-meaning "Scots, that they consented to take new go-" vernours of their church, who were to have " a degree and pre-eminence above their brethren, "viz. the Prelate Bishops." And a little after he fays further, "Palladius having brought " Hierarchie into the church of Scotland, takes " to his next care to provide for the mainten-" ance of this new degree and order, which was " obtained without great difficulty of both Prince " and people, under pretext of piety, but with " bad fuccess, as by the wofull experience of " following times we have found." From these descriptions, each of them improving upon, and swelling out what had gone before, we are led to believe that Palladius had entirely altered the old constitution, and had continued so long among the Scots as to have had full time to fettle every thing on a regular and well digested plan. the other hand there are historians, and these too of no mean figure either for antiquity or credit, whom Archbishop Usher produces as differing Usher de widely from all this: Nennius, for instance, Mat-cap. 15, 16. thew Florilegus, Probus Hibernus, Jocelin, and the writer of St. Patrick's life in the Irish lan-

small success of Palladius' labours. To these m

LETTER guage, &c. who all agree as to the short time a

Scotichr. Lib. vii. cap 4.

Hift. Eccl. liv. 26. § 13.

be added the continuator of Fordun's histor who fays that "on the death of Palladius who " Pope Celestine had fent to the Scots, Patri " is ordained Bishop and sent to the Irish:" A the French historian Fleury, who on the author of Bolandus fays, "Pope Celestine having be " acquainted with the death of Palladius who " he had fent into Scotland, appointed St. Patri " in his room, whom he ordained Bishop and se " to preach the faith in Ireland." These accoun speak in a quite different strain from those quot above: Yet they feem for the most part to agr in one thing about Palladius, that he died amo the Picts: Boece mentions the place, and calls Fordun in the Merns: And tho' the histori Fordun fays that the King of the Scots gave the place to Palladius, it is certain from concurre authorities that the part of the country now c led Merns did at that time belong to the Pić Yet that Palladius had some particular conne tion there, either by residence or death, appear from the Pady-fair (Palladii feria) kept up in the neighbourhood to this day. Now what can fairly and on folid grounds make of all this? N thing, I think, from which to draw any just : gument, or upon which to raise any well-co pacted structure, either of Papal supremacy Presbyterian parity: But only in general thabout that time there was a Bishop Palladi fomewhere, in what is now called Scotland, a that his labours had not been of fo long con nuance, nor attended with so much success after ages have without much inquiry believed. LETTER I would not propose, by all this, to derogate from the respect due to old traditions: But I would have fuch traditions to be, if not well supported, at least uniform and well connected, in a word, consistent with one another: And when in a number of traditions on the same subject, we find differences, and even contradictions in material points, the mind, if not warped by prejudice, will only affent to fuch parts as they all agree in and convey down to us: Which is exactly the case before us, and is indeed all I intend by what I have faid about Palladius. There is no more authority for the one class of accounts concerning him, than for the other: But they all agree that there was fuch a man in this country, that he bore the character of a Bishop, and that he died among the Picts. And this, I still think, is the utmost length we can go, with any sure ground to go upon, in our inquiries about him.

Buchanan calls him) would have wished, a

Fuch hist the good man himself, (sanctissimus homo, as ev reg. 80.

I am yours, &c.

IV.

LETTER IV.

Account of the Picts, among whom Palladius dies—Division of their Country into a Souther and Northern District——Christianity introduced into the former by Ninian—into the latter by Columba—assisted or succeeded by Servanus, Kentigern, and others.

Have mentioned in my last letter, that I se no sufficient ground for assigning the mission of Palladius to what is now called Ireland, afte all the pains that Archbishop Usher has taken to deprive our country of him. Neither do I fai Crit. Essay in with another opinion of his, adopted after 9.689.694. wards by the inquisitive Mr. Innes, that even Fer gus MacErch (or to speak in common style, Fei gus II.) of whose existence and reign, there is no the least doubt, was not heard of in Britain, ti about a hundred years after the era assigned t him by our historians. In support of this opin on, the primate produces some Irish legends, an Mr. Innes argues on the improbability of thre fuccessive generations taking up the space of on hundred and eighty fix years, the time betwee the death of Fergus, which is supposed to hav been in 419, and that of Aidan, his great granc

ŀ

fon, which we are certain was in 605. This, he LETTER favs, is against the received rule of allowing three generations to every hundred years, and contrary to what commonly happens in the lives of Kings. Yet our Scottish annals afford an instance afterwards, not far short, of what Mr. Innes objects to: And he feems to have overlooked a difficulty, which embarasses his calculation, as much as he thinks the long lives do the old one. For according to the Irish chronicles, to which he refers. Fergus fon of Erch reigned three years, Dongard fon of Fergus five years, Congald fon of Dongard twenty four years; so that this last began his reign in 511; when by the constitution, which did not then admit a minor to the throne, he must have been at least twenty one years of age, and consequently born, at or before the Now we are told in the legends Year 400. quoted by Usher, that about this time Fergus was "adolescens," a young man, the youngest indeed of twelve brethren, who wanted to turn him out of his share of their paternal heritage: Which does not well agree with his being then a grandfather, as this curtailing scheme represents him. So little certainty or correctness is there to be found in these old accounts, when they come to be too particular, and to give too minute a detail of men and things. And I mention this, only to shew how little clearness is to ^{*} King Duncan was murdered by MacBeth in 1040. His fon Malcolm Canmore died in 1093. David I. Malcolm's fon died in 1153: And William, David's grandfon (who in respect of age might have been David's son) died in 1214. So that here we have a hundred and seventy sour years for three successions, which is not much short of the contended distance between Fergus and Aidan.

latorem

cap. xi.

LETTER be looked for in the accounts of our church go-IV. vernment, when our civil history is involved in fuch a cloud of obscurity.

I admit, and I think from fufficient authority. that Palladius was in this country at a time when the people called Scots had a King reigning over them, and that he was clothed with, and empowered to act in the Episcopal character: But how long he stayed here, or what places he acted in, and what regulations or fettlements he made, we have no certain information. Front his being fent to the believing Scots we are not to infer that his labours were confined to them; and his dying at Fordun in the very heart almost of the then Pictish kingdom is a presumption at least that he had some connection with, and relation to that people. Indeed this feems to be hinted at in another book of Prosper's, where Centra Col. speaking of Celestine's zeal against the Pelagians in Britain, he fays "having ordained a Bishop " for the Scots, while he labours to preserve " the Roman (part of the island) orthodox, he " likewise made the barbarian (part of it) chri-" ftian." This is one of those passages which Archbishop Usher would fain lay hold of, to carry Palladius over to Ireland, because of the antithesis between the "Romanam et barbaram infulam." which he would render the Roman and barbarian island. But both grammar and fact justify my way of rendering it: For none of the Roman writers ever called the whole island Roman, or if at any time they seem to do so, it is with respect to those over-sea nations, spoken of by Gildas and Bede, beyond the friths, which were in those days called seas, and made the Northern parts be often called another island. Now upon this interpretation of the "barbarous island," in LETTER. Prosper, being that part of Britain not subject to IV. the Romans, I think it fairly follows that the Picts ought to be included in this description, as it is certain that in Prosper's time, and both before and after him, the Picts were as formidable to, and as well known by the Romans as the Scots were.

this

This consideration, joined to the best attested part of Palladius' history, that he died and was buried among the Picts, opens up to us another kene which has not as yet been looked at, but which from the nature and defign of this present disquisition, we shall find of equal importance and concern to us: And that is to take a view of the time and manner of introducing the christian aith among that other ancient people of the Northern parts of Britain, fo much and fo long diffinguished both in the Roman and Scottish anby the name of Picts. I have often wondered that their conversion should have been so little taken notice of, and that even christian writers have been so silent about them, as if they had been a despicable race with whom the present inhabitants of Scotland had no manper of concern, or had reason to be ashamed of them: And I cannot help thinking that this neglect is in a great measure the cause of much of that confusion and inaccuracy to be met with in our ecclesiastical antiquities. We are so taken with, and so fond of the title of Scots, which indeed has been now long and universally known, that we seldom think of any other people having ever been in this country: And when at any time or by any tradition we hear of this or that famous man preaching the gospel, and planting LETTER the church in these Northern parts, we tall the glory of all this to the Scots, and fay, the fo and fo was done in Scotland. This might part well enough upon the main, and among the multitude, but it is not fatisfying to the impartial in quirer, nor agreeable to the rules of historical nicety. I know it has been faid, that the Scott now-a-days have no business with these old Picts who were all destroyed and rooted out, man woman, and child of them, more than nine hund red years ago, by our brave and victorious Kim Kenneth. Yet, if it were so, it would still be matter of curiofity, if not of necessity, to ask if and when, and how these Picts, once a powerfu and extensive nation, got any knowledge of the truth, or had any vestiges of a christian churd among them. It will be objected, that there are no records of these people remaining: Because if ever there were any fuch, they were all lost an fwallowed up in the common destruction. to be lamented indeed, that we have so few at thentic and connected accounts of these old inha bitants of North-Britain, not of the Picts only but even of the Scots also. The casualties of time, and the ravages of war have been equal injurious to both nations, and the Scottish ant quities have fuffered as much in proportion from the devastations of Edward Longshanks, as the Pictish could have done from the conquest a Kenneth Macalpin. The defect of evidence there fore needs be no objection against an inquiry is to the state of Pictish christianity: And the ne tion of the universal destruction of their nation which prevailed a while, is now justly explode and given up. Probability and fact are bot against it. The Scottish King Kenneth was, b

his grandmother, the true heir of the Pictish LETTER kingdom: And the in profecution of that lady's right, which was begun by, and fatal to his father Alpin, Kenneth was obliged to use force against the intermediate usurpers and their partimans, which could not but be productive of much bloodshed on both sides, yet it is not to be thought that, after his last decisive victory, he either did or would extirpate the remains of a people whom he had all along claimed as his moper and liege subjects: Especially when we consider the folly of desolating such a vast part of his dominions as the Pictish territories -certainly were, and the impossibility, for a long time at halt, of peopling that large country out of his own old kingdom, which, as Robert Bruce told Jo. Maj. his army, in his speech to them before the battle hist. lib. is of Bannockburn, was scarcely the third part of what is now called Scotland. In confirmation of which, and further to confute the strange ancy of a total massacre of such a numerous people, we find in fact that Kenneth himself and Usher Pr. some of his successors are, by several old writers, cap. xv. mor to Fordun, called Kings of the Picts. From Crit. Effry these and other undoubted documents, it may p. 153-166. varrantably be inferred that the present inhabiants of Scotland, which in process of time came to be the known name of the united kingdoms, are as much the offspring and race of the Picts a of the Scots: Consequently, that we are as much interested in the concerns of the Picts both in church and state, as we are with the Scots, and equally entitled to take a view, as distinctly we can with the few helps we have, of the celesiastical antiquities of both. We all lay claim. and we think justly too, the from different mo-

LETTER tives, to Palladius, because it is said he was sent to the believing Scots, and every party among us agrees in calling him the first Scottish Bishop: Yet we have a cloud of concurring authorities that this first Bishop of the Scots died and was buried "in terra Pictorum," among the Picts-Is there not something here, sufficient to raise our curiofity, and to put us upon inquiring how this had come about? It is not faid he was martyred among them, which would not have been omitted if the case had been so: And therefore it may be supposed they were friendly to him, and had heard of christianity either from him or from some one or other before him.

Indeed Buchanan, upon what authority I know not, would make us believe that the Picts were christians at the time of the expulsion of the Scots, and complains much of them for their cruelty to the then Scottish Priests and Monks, at the fame time that they themselves were "publice". Buch. hift. " christianis institutis imbuti," that is, made public profession of the christian rites. But Bede. an older writer by more than eight hundred years. attributes the conversion of the Picts to a Ninias or Ninianus, whom our vulgar language calls St.

lib. iv. in reg. 39,

Bed.lib. iii. Ringan. For he fays "The Southern Picts, who cap. 4. "dwell on the South fide of the mountains. " leaving the errors of idolatry, had embraced

"the true faith by the preaching of Bishop "Nynias, a reverend and holy man of the na"tion of the Britons, who had been regularly " instructed in the mysteries of religion at Rome,

" and fixed his Episcopal seat at a place in the " province of the Bernicians called " Candida Ca-

" fa," because he built there a church of white " stone, contrary to the custom of the Britons."

Fordun specifies his being coeval with St. Martin LETTER of Tours who died in 401, and fays, he preached IV. to the nations "ultra fretum Scoticum," which in Fordun's fense who lived at St. Andrews, Scotichr. means South of the Frith of Forth. Boece calls cap. 9. him the renowned Doctor of the Scots, Picts, and Britons: Tho' John Major, who was co-tem-Boeth. porary with Boece, doubts of his having taught lib. vii. the Scots, from the collect which used to be read in the office for him, and begins thus, "God who by the doctrine of the holy Bishop and Confes-" for Ninian didst teach the nations of the Picts and Britons," without mentioning the Scots. Maj. lib.ii. The general voice of history calls him the Apostle cap. 2. of the Picts, and it is commonly thought he died about the year 430, when Palladius came over, tho', as I hinted before, Buchanan out of his own head makes him one of Palladius' scholars, no doubt to put the better face upon the then favourite notion of Palladius being the first who made Bishops in Scotland. It is not material to inquire where these Southern Picts dwelt, as it is enough for my present purpose that they had a Bishop Ninian among them. Yet we may take Fordun says, they a look at this question too. dwelt to the South of the Scottish Frith: And Ranulphus in his Polychronicon tells us more particularly, "That they dwelt in that part of the island which, extending from the Roman wall to the Scottish sea, contained in it Galloway to the Scottin lea, contained in A Sandray and Lothian." But Archbishop Usher will not lib. i. c. 58. allow this, and confines them to the countries between the Forth and the Grampian hills, where the writer of St. Ninian's life says, "He ordained " Presbyters, consecrated Bishops, divided the land " into dioceses, and having settled all in the faith,

IV. to have no other reason for removing these Pict

Cíh Prim.

to have no other reason for removing these Pict to the North of the Forth, than because, as he thinks, that Southern tract having been reduced into a Roman province by the name of Valentia, was in Ninian's time possessed by the Britons, and in I ede's time by the Northumbrian Angles. Yet that province we are told, was erected in 368, after which the Roman power began to decline more and more in these parts: Till at last, as Gildas complains, about the year 426, which coincides with Ninian's history, the Picts took peaceable possession of all the mid-land provinces towards the Eastern coast, up to the Northumbrian wall, and continued so till some time after the coming in of the Saxons in 449.

In any case we may date the first appearance of christianity among the Picts from the time of St. Ninian, and attribute it, in a great measure, if not entirely, to his labours. We are not to expect a regular fuccession or distinct account of church-matters in these confused times, and among a people fo much addicted to war, and almost perpetually in the field, either marching against, or retiring from enemies. It is very well, every thing considered, that we know so much of them as we do. About St. Ninian's time, from the bitter invectives that Gildas throws out against them, we find them as far South as the Northumbrian wall. When the Saxons came over, they foon made peace with the Picts, to turn their arms against the Britons who had fent for them: And tho' these Saxons, after having humbled the Britons, oft times fell upon the Picts also, and by degrees got such a footing in the midland provinces as to make them a part of the kingdom of Ber-nicia fet up by Ida in 547, yet it does not appear LETTER that the Picts of these parts were expelled, but still remained uneafy under the Saxon yoke, and ready on all opportunities to recover their possessions out of the hands of these new masters. So then according to the various events of these contentions, we may believe their church affairs would be regulated. Thus Bede tells us, that when Bed. Hift. Ofwi King of the Northumbrians had in a great measure subdued the Picts and Scots who inhabited the North of Britain, (that is, the parts as far north as the Friths of Forth and Clyde, which these old writers oft suppose to be the Northern extremities of what they call Britain,) and made them tributary to him, he appointed Wilfrid, Archbishop of York, to be Bishop of the Picts, as far as Oswi's empire over them extended. 670, Egfrid the fon and fuccessor of Oswi defeated the revolting Picts with a great flaughter. In 681, Wilfrid being on account of his pride and turbulent humour banished out of the Northumbrian territories, Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, who then was Wilfrid's enemy, divided the fee of York into three or four Episcopal jurisdictions, and among the rest ordained one Trumwine Bishop of the province of the Picts which was then subject to the English: This Trumwine affished at a synod held by Theodore in 685 at Twiford in Northumberland, and fubscribes himfelf, Trumwine Bishop of the Picts. That same year Egfrid was killed in battle by the Picts, who thereupon, fays Bede, "recovered all their pof-Bed. lib. in " fessions which the Angles had held: And "Trumwine, who had been their Bithop, retired " with his Monks and Clergy, from Abercorn " in the neighbourhood of the Forth, where they

LETTER " had refided, to the monastery of Streneshal, # IV. " Whitby, where he died." I have taken more notice of all this, both to shew the con ed and fluctuating state of the Southern pa of what is now Scotland, when the inhabita first came over to christianity, and to confirm probability I have already mentioned, of th people's having been affifted and directed in the conversion by the clergy in their Southern nei bourhood, who, we are fure, as far back as have any certainty about them, whether Brit or Saxons, were always, without interrupti under the inspection of Bishops. This then the situation of church affairs at first and for sc tract of time, in the Southern division of the Picts, whom I have no scruple to call, in p our ancestors. But there was another division of them, to

North of the Grampian hills, and extending along the Eastern coast of what is now called Lowlands, to the utmost extremity of the isla even as some think to the very Orkneys. To were not so soon converted as their South countrymen, probably because of their so m greater remoteness from the opportunities of ...

Bed. lib. ii. tish assistance. For Bede tells us, it was only the year 565, which was the 9th year of the King Brude, son of Meilochon, that the gowas preached to them by the labours and piet

Usber de

Prim.

cap. 15.

the famous Columba. This man was born Ireland, about the year 520, of noble parent; and being obliged, on account of some religi differences, to leave his native country, where had long been conspicuous for his zeal and re

larity, came over to the Western isles of Scotla and got one of them, then called Hy, in dona from the Scottish King Convallus, where he LETTER Sounded a monastery under his own inspection as Abbot, which in process of time became, and Lang continue!, of great repute over all Britain. This is that island which Boece calls Iona, and to which he fays Fergus II. fent the valuable collecmice of books from Rome: Tho' by the undoubted testimony of cotemporary writers we are assured Columba was the first who began a monastery in and from whom it feems to have got the name of lona, which fignifies in Hebrew what Columba does in Latin, a Dove, as in honour of him it is to this day called Hy-Columkill. This holy man's life was written about eighty years after his death by Adamnanus, one of his fuccetfors in the government of that monastery, which, next to the writings of Gildas, is the most ancient historical piece remaining of any British writer. And by it we are informed, that Columbus' journeys from Hy, going to and returning from the habitation of Brude King of the Picts, were by Lough-ness: Whence it appears, that besides the ordinary abode of the Pictish Kings at Abernethy in Strathern, King Brude mult have had another refidence at the North end of Lough-ness, and that probably too his dominions extended to the Orkmeys, fince we find Columba intreating King Brude to command the Prince of the Orkneys (who was prefent, and had given hostages to Brade for his fidelity) to be favourable to the Monks whom Columba had sent to these islands. Uther de This Brude was a pagan, and shut his doors Prim c. 15. seainst Columba when he first went to visit him: Crit. Estay, But the affiliaty and perfeverance of the holy p. 83-93man prevailed, and laid fuch a foundation for the general conversion of that whole division,

IV. Northern Picts, as St. Ninian fo long before is the Southern. And thus we fee how and when christianity was begun among that once renown people of the Picts, from whom I have faid the prefent inhabitants of Scotland are, in all probability, as much descended, and with whom,

as they are from or with the Scots.

But these two, Ninian and Columba, are neethe only respectable names in the religious histomerof our country in these early times. We read a St. Servanus, whom our historians make a ciple of Palladius, and they further say that Paladius ordained him Bishop, and sent him to corkneys. The writer of St. Mungo's life, who that case, they certainly are as much connect-

Archbishop Usher quotes as prior to Fordun, sathat "Palladius, on his coming to Scotlar coming to Scot Prim. c. 15. been here before Palladius, and had got fome fort of refidence about the Frith of Forth: for Fordung fpeaking of the island of Inch-keith, fays, "In it prefided the Abbot S. Adamnanus, who honour ably received St. Servanus with his companions on their first coming into Scotland." And in the life of St. Mungo we read that Servanus baptized him at Culinros, now Culross in Fife, where he was born. Which traditions, if true, Scotichr.

Lib. i.

cap. 6.

make this old Saint belong to the Picts, as much as his being employed by Palladius would, on the common hypothesis, assign him to the Scots.

Another shining character in these old chronicles is Kentigern, or St. Mungo: Of whom tradition goes that he was of Royal blood, being, as was supposed, the son of Eugenius III. King of LETTER the Scots by a Thametis, daughter or grandchild to a Lothus King of the Picts; that his mother, to conceal her difference, bore him privately at Culrofs on the Forth, that St. Servanus baptized the child there, and called him first Kean-tiern, which fignifies Head-Lord, but afterwards, on feeing the boy's good qualities, gave him the familiar appellation of Munghu, dear friend, whence came both his names, the Latin Kentigernus and vulgar Mungo. But there is a difficulty in this account of making Servanus baptize Mungo, if Servanus was a man of repute when Palladius came to the country in 430, and if it be true which John of Tinmouth writes of Mungo, that he went to Rome to visit Pope Gregory, who came to the Popedom in 500. In which case either Servanus or Kentigern must have lived to an extreme old age, much beyond the common length of life even in those days. I know this difficulty has been foreseen by Kentigern's biographers, and a folution offered, by telling us that he lived a hundred and eighty five years, which indeed removes the objection, but at the expence of a very great improbability. Yet we have good authority to be affured that there was fuch a person; that he was a good and holy man; that he preached the gospel in the country about Glasgow, and founded a church there, where the cathedral to this day is called after him St. Mungo's; that being driven from that see by the iniquity of one Merkin, a petty prince of the country, he retired into North Wales, and fat some years Bishop in a place called Elwy; that being invited back by Merkin's successor Roderick, he left his charge in Wales to his disciple Asaph, (from whom it has returned to Glasgow, where he died in a good old age. This is all that can be gathered with any confidence concerning him, out of the various, and some of them unchronological, accounts of him that his historians have published to the world.

80

IETTER been long called the diocese of St. Asaph,) and IV.

I might have mentioned fundry other old preachers in our country, of whom we have only the names extant: and these names too so much contended about, that we are not certain whether they belonged to our forefathers or not. But these I have mentioned admit of no dispute, and are allowed by universal consent to have planted the gospel at various times, and in the various parts of what is now called Scotland. Even Pakladius himself, whom from our present title of Scots we pretend to have most concern in, note withstanding of all the stir that the Irish writers have made to confine him to their country, is acknowledged by these very writers to have died in what is now our country, and a place in our country retains his name and memory to this

Upon the whole then, from what has been faid this much follows, that in the space of about two hundred years, from the year 400 or thereabout, to the year 603 when Columba died, we see in this country a Ninian among the Southern Picts and at Whitehern in Galloway, a Palladius sent to the Scots and dying in the Merns, a Servanus at Culross, a Kentigern at Glasgow, and a Columba in the Western isles and at Lochness. And, except Columba, we find them all called Bishops, and spoken of as performing all the offices, and exercising all the powers that ever any of the primitive Bishops did. Whether they possessed the LETTER large revenues, or enjoyed the splendid dignities of modern Bishops, is not a material question.— They were Bishops in the true Apostolical sense, and that is sufficient for the friends of Episcopacy. The darkness of those ages, as well as the confuled unfettled state of our country, for a long time after it became christian, prevents our getting such clear intelligence in these matters, as the Eastern parts of the world, and the annals of polite Greece and Rome afford. Any civilization of our Northern parts came in with christianity, and it is not to be expected that in the dawning of that civilization our country should be able to furnish such accurate historians as those nations who had been so long polished and improved before us. We are now advancing to an era of some more light and intelligence, than what we have yet met with, though still not so clear and fatisfactory as could be wished. However, such it is, my next letter shall begin to lay it open: Mean time, I conclude this with being, as ever,

·mi-

Yours, &c.

V.

LETTER V.

Mission of Augustin into Britain by Pope Gregory ——Consequences of it——Account of the ecclefiastical Historian Bede——and of the Pictish Churches as recorded by him and others. Story of Regulus, with the Relicts of St. Andrew—— Account of the Pictish Church concluded.

THEN I call the mission of Augustin and his associates into Britain by Pope Gregory, an era of more light and intelligence than what we have yet met with, I do not mean that any new illumination was thereby conveyed to our country, but only that the old communication was again opened, which had formerly fubfisted between the island of Britain, and the polite part of the continent. This communication had been in a great measure interrupted, during the most of the time when those christian Worthies flourished, whom I have mentioned in the preceding letter. The power of the Romans was much diminished both at home and abroad, about the time of Palladius. Not many years after, they withdrew their troops altogether out of Britain. And in their room, the Saxons, a heathen and barbarous race, got entrance.— Thefe

These perfidious auxiliaries soon turned their arms LETTER against the poor christian Britons, and drove such of them as escaped their butchering hands into the mountains of Wales, or over the Solway Firth into the South-west parts of Scotland. The Scots and Picts all this time were likewise in perpetual agitation; sometimes sighting with one another, sometimes affisting the Southern contenders, and many times obliged to defend their own territories against the Saxon invaders. They had little or no acquaintance with writers abroad, who might have recorded their transactions, and little leisure or quiet at home to record them themselves.

With respect to Ireland, the case seems to have been very different. That island, tho' so near to Britain which was one entire scene of confusion and tumult, had long enjoyed peace. The Romans had never attempted a fettlement in it, tho' fo oft provoked by the Scots making inroads into the British territories: Which, by the by, is another proof that these Scots had not come out of Ireland on fuch incursions, since it is more than probable, if the Romans had known fo, that they would, when victorious as they oft were, have purfued these pillagers, as they called them, into their own country, and taken revenge of them at home. Neither Picts, Britons, nor Saxons ever looked towards Ireland with hostile designs. .Some squabbles might have been now and then among their petty lords and princes at home: But they were not molested by foreign enemies; and it was not till near three hundred years after the period now before us, that the Norwegians, under their leader Turgefius, made that lamentable devastation in it for thirty years, of which LETTER their writers give fuch a tragical description. Accordingly when St. Patrick landed in Irelan which was much about the time of Palladius, find his business going on quietly enough on t whole, notwithstanding of a few interruptions ne and then, and churches planted thro' various parts of the island in such order, and with fu continuance of success, that before the year 6c which I am supposing terminates our British e of darkness, there were Bishoprics erected, ar monasteries and colleges sounded and sourishing in almost every province of it. And what coul this so glaring difference be owing to, but to th calm and freedom from external invasions which Ireland was blest with, while the poor island o Britain continued a perpetual field of desolation and bloodshed to the warlike Picts, the fiero Scots, the perfecuted Britons, and the barbarou Saxons, divided at last among themselves into the heptarchy or feven kingdoms?

A. Di 596.

But when Augustin, or Austin, came over, th condition of Britain had begun to put on anothe kind of face. In the North, the Picts had bee enlightened by the rays of the gospel breakin in upon them, from the preaching of a Britil Ninian and an Irish Columba. The Scots had go full time to model their government into some for of regular order, and were beginning to atten more to police than to plunder. The old Briton after many fruitless struggles for liberty, had no fat down more contentedly than for many years pai in the wild and confined habitations to which the were reduced: And the victorious Saxons had t last been satisfied with the fine provinces which they had got possession of either by arms or treat and began to look abroad to the neighbouring nent for alliances and connexions. For about LETTER me we read, that Ethelbert the King of Kent, nost powerful of all the Saxon Monarchs, had Bed. lib. is ed Bertha, daughter to Charibert, one of the cap. 25. of Gaul, who being a Christian, had pac-l with Ethelbert for her religion, and had ht a Bishop Luidard out of Gaul with her. then, besides a door opened to Austin, the writers on the Romish side have not rly acknowledged, we find a correspondence ring which had not been for many years , and which in time would no doubt tend oduce the defirable effects of cultivation and ment. And as these happy effects are by licious writers confessed to have been owing : Roman fettlements in Britain, without jusg the ambition and lust of power from these settlements arose, so we need not heto attribute the same good consequences to ission of Austin and his companions, without obliged to approve the title, or homologate aims, of him who fent them. We fee chriy stepping in among the Saxons before Grethought proper to take any notice of them. as it was acknowledged, with respect to the to whom Palladius was fent, that they were ers in Christ, so was the case with the Saxoo: There were believers, and the means lieving among them, before Austin had any to do with them. And these weak bengs might have in time and by degrees inand spread over the whole land, tho' nei-Gregory nor any of his fuccessors had ever ered. For, even as it was, this mission was forwarded by the correspondence already ed between the Kentish and Gaulish courts, which

V. preters to go with him: And when he landed he found a King who had heard of christianism a Queen who with her retinue made public prefision of it, a Bishop with clergy to govern' a assist that infant church, and a temple or church of old standing, since the times of British characteristic, where the Queen and her Bishop met the offices of christian worship. Here then was foundation laid, and that too on a new a friendly intercourse between the pagan Saxonand christian Franks, which, in process of times Bishop Luidard and Queen Bertha might has built upon, and raised a goodly structure from. But not to infift further upon this, it is enough for me to take the fact as it stands, and to date from this period a new era of intelligence and communication about the church affairs of the whole island. For in less than a century after Austin, arose the Venerable Bede, as he is called who is the first proper ecclesiastical historian tha Britain can boast of. The Adamnanus, whom ! spoke of before, tho' he was a little older than Bede, wrote only the life of his predecessor Co. lumba, and confined himself to the labours of that Saint in the monastery of Hy, and among the Northern Picts. But Bede, having by his connexions a more extensive correspondence, tool a larger compass, and thro' his history of the Saxon churches, which feems to have been his main design, intersperses all that he knew o ecclefiastical matters among the other nations o Britain. And he had good opportunity of being tolerably well acquainted with the Northern na tions, being born in what is now called the bishoprick of Durham, and residing all his time in the monastery of Wiremouth in that district, LETTER not far distant from the Pictish borders. From him therefore we have the first sure beginnings of acquaintance even with our own church concems. And tho', when he goes back to the remote antiquities of our original plantations, and has nothing but vague reports at such a vast dilance of time to trust to, he may sometimes fall into mistakes, as later critics have discovered; vet in his accounts of fuch things as were so near to his own day, especially of ecclesiastical matters, which feem to have been his principal study, he certainly deserves all the credit ulually given to writers of his character. From him we have learned the conversion of the Southem Picts by St. Ninian, and from Adamnanus that of the Northern Picts by St. Columba. For method's sake therefore let me at once discuss what we know of the church history of that people, from the era of their respective converfions down to their union with, or fubjection to the Scots under Kenneth Macalpin. And for this, little tho' it be, we are obliged to Bede, and some few remains of Pictish annals that have come down to our times. Indeed it is but fome loofe and scattered hints that we have to trust to. A continued chain of history is not to be expected. Some fragments have been met with and preserved by a few curious antiquaries. The Scott. Hist. laborious Mr. Thomas Innes has published an old Crit. Essay chronicle or catalogue of the Pictish Kings, from p. 101-140.

their first King Cruithne down to Brude their and last King, which the Mr. Goodall seems to def- introduct. pife on account of some chronological defects, ch. 9. yet it appears on the main to be not altogether contemptible, as it contains some anecdotes re-

LETTER lative to our present inquiry. In it we read, to V. in the nineteenth year of Drust the son of learning their thirty seventh King, the holy Bishop Patalanded in Ireland: That Nectan Morbet, son Erp their thirty ninth King, in the 5th you of his reign gave Abernethy with its pertinate God and St. Brigide, in presence of a kabbes Dairlugtach, who sung Allelujah over donation. Fordun indeed says, it was Garn son of Domnach, (whom the chronicle makes the fiftieth King,) who built the collegiate church Abernethy, which place he adds was the case both royal and episcopal, of all the kingcommunication.

fiftieth King,) who built the collegiate church Abernethy, which place he adds was the c feat, both royal and episcopal, of all the kingc of the Picts for many years. The chronicle li wise tells us, that Brude son of Meilochon the forty ninth King, was baptized by St. Columb the ninth year of his reign, which Bede says conformity to the computation of years in the talogue, was the year 565. From other account we learn, that a Constantine King of the P founded the bishoprick of Dunkeld, and a H gus, cotemporary with our Achaius, endow Kilremont, now St. Andrews. And the char lary of St. Andrews mentions a Brude son of D gard, their last King before their union, w Folio 50,51. gave Lochlevin to God and St. Servanus.

gave Lochlevin to God and St. Servanus.

Such is the lame and imperfect intelligence are able to pick out of scattered fragments, a find it difficult enough, I own, to knit these counts to one another, or adjust them to the ru of chronology. Yet in general they shew, t christianity had made a considerable progress mong the Picts, and was liberally supported, cording to the picty of those times. It has be thought that they had but one Bishop at a till and that his seat was at Abernethy the met of the kingdom: And this too has been LETTER ved into an objection against modern Episy by the impugners of that constitution. But t had been so, of which however we have tainty, such a provision might have served rigencies of the church in those days, and r a people who probably were not all, and ce converted from paganism, so might have fupplied in facred ministrations by inferior under the inspection of one Bishop. It o, as we read in church history, with the ians and Goths who, for a long time after anity got footing among them, had but one to take care of them. Indeed of the reand continued fuccession of our Pictish s we have few, if any, certain accounts. is neither to be wondered at, nor made a e of one way or other, as it is not fingular. the early times of ecclefiastical antiquity. y presents us with a vast number of churches rica, Asia, Greece, &c. where we are sure, corresponding documents, there were reguontinued successions of Bishops, and yet we nothing of the names of most of these pe, unless any of them now and then made ire, or were engaged in any controversy or tant business that came within the sphere lory to take notice of. And this feems to been the case with our Pictish churches. had few or no historians of their own, and were not conspicuous enough on the stage rope to have their ecclesiastical affairs handown to posterity by foreigners. Yet we the names of some of their Bishops pre-I to this day. Their first converter Ninian led a Bishop by all who speak of him, as

Ufher ut

Palladius.*

Well as his cotemporaries Ambrose or Augusting.

V. are. We read of a Columba about the year 64.

Bishop of Dunkeld, which at that time belonge to the Picts, and who educated the famous Stutherder. Cuthbert. I have already mentioned a Trum wine Bishop at Abercorn among the Picts about the year 68c. In a council held at Rome be Pope Gregory II. in 721, we find among the Tulfcribers a "Fergustus Episcopus Scotiæ Pictus.

Pictish Bishop of Scotland, along with a Sed lius "Episcopus Britanniæ de genere Scotoru no Ficur. hist. Bishop of Britain from the nation of the Secoles and Even as far down as towards the close of the Pictish monarchy, according to Archbishop Use Inc.

Pictish monarchy, according to Archbishop Universe we meet with a Tarnanus Bishop of the Pict whom yet the primate would be claiming Ireland by producing an old martyrology with there is mention of a St. Tarnanus, Bishop Lismore in Ireland. Perhaps this Tarnanus Bishop of the Picts may be the same with the disciples dun Tarananus, but who, in any shape, seems have been a man of great repute, as there place called after him to this day Banchory and his memory preserved, as is the common way among us, by a market, St. Tarnan's Fabout the middle of June, like the Paddy-sair honour of his predecessor, and probably his manner.

Palladius whom Boece calls Tervanus, and

* This place, which stands upon Dee twelve miles or so from Aberdeen, tho' now but a petty obscure village, appears the name of it to have been a place of some account, like the mous Banchor in Wales, which in the British language, we told, signifies "pulcher chorus" the fair or goodly choir, was once a renowned monastery and the seat of learning in the country, but different from the now bishoprick of Bangor

I have not, in this collection of broken intelli-LETTER gence about the Pictish church, taken any notice of the wonderful story of Regulus with the relicts of the Apostle St. Andrew, under a Pictish King Hergust, about the year 360, which has been much insisted on, and even made the foundation of our metropolitical see of St. Andrews, but is so consounded with jarring narrations, and wrapped up in such a cloud of fable, that it will not go down with an age so hard to please in these matters as ours is. I know the Barons of Scotland

Canarvon shire: For the old monastery of Banchor, which has long been in ruins, was in Flintshire, upon a river called Dee too, which separates this part of Wales from Cheshire. It was the Abor of this monastery, Dinothus, who opposed the pretensions of the Pope's missionary Austin, and resolutely told him, that he and his Monks owed obedience to none upon earth, but, under Christ, to their metropolitan the Bishop of Caerleon upon Esk: In punishment of which contumacy, it is faid that, according to Austin's prophecy, Edilfrid King of the Northumbrian Saxons Son after marched an army against them, and murdered eleven bundred and fifty of them in one day. It is certain they had long been a respectable body, and as it were, an academy to all the South parts of Britain. There was likewise in Ireland, and mo doubt in imitation of this British one, a monastery of Banchor in Ulster, founded by a St. Congal about the year 560.— Why then may not our Banchory be supposed to have had its from some resemblance to the British Banchor, and so to have been a choir or feat of clergy to the Picts of that district, either founded or pitched upon by Bishop Tarnanus to be his re-Ideace in the neighbourhood, as it is, of his predecessor's Fordun? The decay of the place now from what perhaps it has been a thousand years ago, needs be no greater objection to this suppothan the present condition of Abernethy in Strathern is aguilt its having once been the habitation of the Pictish Kings. If so, it points out the remains at least of a church settlement in the Northern parts, and shews that, however mean and undisinguifhed a spot this Banchor Tarnani is now, it may have been acollege of clergy for the instruction of our forefathers long beher either Aberdeen or Mortlich.

V. Rome, and afterwards in their famous letter to the Pope, do build much upon this legend: But these great men were not critics: Neither ditheir cause require it. All they had to do, was to produce some counter pleas of antiquity, whether just or not, to bear down, with an equal sace of effrontery, the sabulous stories of the King of England in support of his unjust claim. A mor likely beginning of a connection with St. Andremight have been had from the later and bette vouched account in our historians, and even it

Buch. hist. Buchanan himself, of St. Andrew appearing to the then Pictish King Hungus about the year 800 or so, and promising him the victory over his enemies, which accordingly he gained the next day. That our forefathers must have had some cause or other for a particular regard to the me-

land, as long, at least, as it was fashionable for nations to observe such distinctions, and pick out their patrons from the Kalendar. This is a well known fact, and whatever light it may be viewe in now, whether as an insignificant whim or preposterous practice, it is certain our ancestor thought otherwise. But whence should the Sco have derived this peculiar veneration for St. As drew? It was not to their country, nor among the that the Achaian Monk Regulus brought his r

mory of this Apostle, appears from his having been always reckoned the Patron-Saint of Scot is faid to have appeared. It was the people of the Picts who had the glory of all this; Yet the Scots claimed it as belonging to them. Whe could this be owing to, but to a belief that the Kings were the proper successors to those Pi

ti

licts. It was not to a King of theirs that the Apost

with Kings, not the destroyers of the nation? And LETTER consequently that they were justly entitled to V. every privilege or part of character which their Pictish predecessors had ever enjoyed. Before I have done with the Pictish church, it may be proper to give some account of the successors of St. Ninian in his see of Candida Casa or Whitebern, which, whatever it did then, has now for many years belonged to our kingdom of Scotand. But indeed from the time of that venerable Prelate, who died in it about the year 430, we have nothing on record about it, till near three hundred years after, that we meet with a Pecthelmus in it. It is true Boece pretending Bede's authority, speaks of an Acca in it. But Bede Boeth, Hist. himself, who was acquainted with Acca, places Lib. 9him in Hagulstad, now Hexam, and makes Pecthelmus his cotemporary. To Petthelmus fuc-Bed. lib. w ceded Frithwald in 735, in whose time Egbert cap. 24ling of the Northumbrians, and Unnust King cap 15. of the Picts, took Alcluid, and brought all the people of that province under their subjection.— To Frithwald in 763 succeeded Pechtwin: To Pechtwin Ethelbert in 777: To Ethelbert in 791 leadwulf, and then a Hethred, after whose time that country was feized by the Scots, and by them called Galloway, which came under the inpection of the Bishop of Sodor in Man, till halcolm Canmoir restored the see of Whitehern, and made it the cathedral of Galloway ever after. Such have been the alterations and vicisfitudes of government in these parts: And it is not to be wondered at, if the records of the church should have proportionably suffered amidst these confusons of the state. I always am, . Yours, &c.

LETTER

LETTER VI.

LETTER VI.

Farther Account of Columba, and of the Monastery which he founded in Hy—Passage of Bede relating to it—Story of Columba recorded by Adamnanus—Mission of Aidan, Finan, and Colman, from the Monastery of Hy, to the Northumbrian Church—these three proved to be Bishops of Lindisfarne in that Church.

TAVING, in the preceding letter, finished what little account we can give of the ecclesiastical affairs of the Picts, we return now to the other half of our original stock, the Scots; and perhaps we shall not find much to say of them, during the period we are now looking back We have heard of a Palladius sent from Rome to them about the year 430, and of a Columba from Ireland getting a residence among them in 565. But here is a long interval of more than a hundred and thirty years, which we do not well know how to fill up. Our own historians indeed, of whom the oldest extant is eight hundred years posterior to this period, are at no more loss for this space, than they were for the space of two hundred years before. they have produced no good vouchers for what they

they fay of either. As the uncertainty, or I may LETTER fay, the improbability of the story of the first forty Kings, leaves us quite in the dark with regard to that long disputed period: So the debates about Palladius are equally unfavourable to a right understanding of his history, and of the state of the Scottish church when he was fent to it. And even when we look forward to the time of Columba, which comes now under our view, we can only learn in general, from the best accounts that have been handed down to us, that the greater part of the Scots then were christians, that their Kings were fo, and that there feems to have been fomething of church order among them. That this had been begun by Palladius may be admitted; but, as appears most likely, with no great fuccess: Probably for want of the language, as it is not to be thought that a Roman clergyman would be acquainted with our old Gaelic, or that the believing Scots would un-This inconvenience, it feems, derstand his Latin. had been feared and attended to in some subsequent missions. For Bede tells us, that when Bed, lib. is Augustine and his companions had, in obedience cap. 23.25. to Pope Gregory's orders, gone so far on their journey toward Britain, they began to be discouraged from the attempt upon many confiderations, of which this was not the least, that they did not understand the language of the country: Upon which the Pope procured them Interpreters from France, who from the affinity of the two languages might be of use to them; and to this assistance col. His: we may reasonably impute a great part of the b. 2. p. 64. fuccess of the undertaking. But we do not read of any fuch provision in the mission of Palladius from the same quarter, so that we cannot LETTER expect to find such a rich harvest under such a sensible disadvantage. Yet some little thing might have been done during even the short time that he continued in this country: And any scattered seeds of the faith which, it seems, had been, by some means or other, sown among the Scots before his coming, might have been encouraged and brought forward by what little wa tering or culture he was able, or had time to bestow upon them. But how the work was carried on from his time to the time of Columba we have little or no certainty. Even Archbishop Spotswood cannot in all that space find the name of any preachers of character among the Scots, but a Hildebert and his scholar Sedulius, whom his brother-primate and cotemporary Usher will not yield to us, but claims, and with reasons in all appearance very cogent, to his own country of Ireland. When Columba indeed appeared a . A. D. mong them, there break out some clearer rays of 565. light concerning them. The monastery which by the gift of the then Scottish King Convallus. who, we are told, was a most pious man, he founded in Hy, foon became famous, and made as great a figure in the church-annals of North Britain, as Banchor did in the South. Columba himself was the first governor or Abbot of it, and we have the names of nine of his successors in that office from the year 597, when he died, to the year 710, viz. Baithenus, Fergnaus, Segemius, Suibneus, Cumineus Albus, Failbeus, Avuner de damnanus, Conanus and Dunchadus. And Bedt Prim. c. 15. tells us further, that this monastry of Hy on Ycolmkill still retained a superiority over all the monasteries of Columba's foundation, either in Britain or Ireland, so that all the monasteries both among the Scots and Northern Picts were LETTER subject to it, which may serve to explain that VI. other mistaken passage of the same Bede, where he fays, "That island uses to have for its gover- Bed. lib. iii. " nor a Presbyter Abbot, to whose jurisdiction all e- 3-

"the province, and the very Bishops, by an " unusual regulation (ordine inusitato) ought to " be subject, after the example of the first Doc" tor of it, who was not a Bishop, but a Pres-

"byter and Monk."

This humiliating observation of Bede's has been much laid hold of by all the opposers of Epilcopacy, both foreign and domestic, and sufscient answers have been as oft given to the arguments drawn from it. It is needless to say that Bede might have been mistaken, which indeed would cut the knot at once. But we may fely fay that his words have been mistaken, and milerably perverted to a quite different meaning from what one of his principles could have intended. It is plain he calls this subjection an surfual custom, and derives it entirely from rebeat to the memory of the great Columba. He hys, the Bishops were subject, &c. But what Bishops? Not all the Bishops of these countries, but the Bishops of that one province; the province where Columba had employed his labours, and in which there might be but one Bishop at time, and in regular fuccession from one to another, which may very well account for Bede's alling them Bishops in the plural number. This * Archbishop Usher's reasoning upon the sub-Usher dejed, who is not in general esteemed a friend to Prim. c. 15. Episcopacy, and yet will not give up this argument from Bede in favour of its opponents. be tells us, from the Ulster annals, that there was

LETTER always a Bishop residing in the island of Hy, b fides the Abbot of the monastery. I know the as having been made up in one of the dark an ignorant ages: But Archbishop Usher was a su ficient judge to distinguish what was genuine an credible in them, and to make use of it accord ingly. But whether it was fo or not, we hav undoubted testimony of Columba himself respect ing the Episcopal character, from the famous stor related by Adamnanus in his life of Columba " A certain Bishop came to Hy, who being wil " ling to conceal his character, and pass for a " Priest only, out of a more than ordinary submit "fion and modesty, Columba upon the Lord' " day defired him to affift him at the confecration " of the Eucharist: But when the stranger cam " up to the altar to break the holy bread, as the " custom of that place was, when two priests were at church together, Columba looking stedfasth " upon him, and discovering his character, defire "him to make use of the privilege of his order by " breaking the bread alone: For, faid he, now w "know that you are a Bishop: Why therefor " have you endeavoured to conceal yourfelf, an " hinder us from giving you due respect and vent " ration?" From this story, related by such a early and cotemporary writer, and a writer to never yet called in question by any judicious ar tiquary or critic, we may draw, besides the infi rence I adduced it for, these other two observe tions: First, that in those days the Scottish churc broke the holy bread at the confecration, an no doubt the church of Rome then did so to tho' it is certain, this practice, warranted as it by our Saviour's own example, and expressed

all the antient liturgies in conformity to St. Paul's LETTER account of the institution, has been laid aside in the Roman church, ever fince their doctrine of correits transubstantiation, made the use of separate waes necessary to establish it against the concurrent expressions of St. Paul, "This is my body "which is broken," and of St. John, "A bone xix. 36. "of him shall not be broken;" From comparifon of which two places, the inference is plain. that the Eucharistical body which was broken. could not be the natural body which was not to be broken. My fecond observation is, that when two Priests were present together, tho' the one might in those days affist the other in the confecration, which I do not know if it be any where customary now, yet no Priest could reguby exercise this part of his office in the presence of a Bishop, nor even concur with a Bishop in this action: But it was the privilege of the Bishop to perform it alone, and a privilege too, to which Columba, with all his authority, willingly, and deently yielded. Besides all this, and to strengthen my position of the island of Hy having a Bishop in it, we read, in the English church history, of a mod held somewhere in Northumberland in 785 a 787, where there were fix subscribing Bishops, # a time when there were but four fees in that lingdom, viz. York, Lindisfarn or Holy Island, Hagulstad or Hexam, and Candida Casa or Whiteem, even allowing this last to have been then mer that jurisdiction. Sir Henry Spelman therethe, and others of their learned men, are of opision that some of the Bishops of Scotland were present at this Northumbrian synod: Only they are at a loss where to place Adulphus, who signs kindelf Episcopus Myiensis ecclesiæ, Bishop of the N 2 church

LETTER church of My. However a writer of our own (

Coll. Hift. Book ii. p. 130 Lite of Bp Sage, p. 53.

fers a very plausible solution of this difficulty, thinking it probable that the transcriber, by very possible mistake of one letter, may have a down Myiensis, for Hyiensis, the church of My is stead of Hy, as he has certainly mistaken another the sees, and called Hexam Augustad instead of H gulstad. If so, here is a Bishop of Hy, only sifty year after Bede's death, which makes it not unlike there might have been one there in his time. But there is little occasion for arguing upon the point. Let us take the passage in the strongest as most literal sense that the words can bear, and fays nothing to the purpose for which it has be so often adduced. The admirers of Monke may boast of it as exalting their prerogative: B it comes aukwardly and impertinently from the friends of ecclefiastical parity to make use of: These Bishops who were subject to the Presbyt Abbot of Hy, were in Bede's time superior other Presbyters, even by his acknowledgment And if that Abbot claimed or exercised more ! periority than was willingly yielded to him, o of veneration to his predecessor Columba, it w an encroachment on the privileges of his bret ren Presbyters, which affects the defenders of n nisterial parity, as much as it does the retainers diocesan prelacy. The truth is, that howev strange the passage may look when taken by itse which is too much the way of managing fu controversies, yet when connected with, and i terpreted by the concurrent practice of the time and by other accounts of the same historian, fhall find nothing in it but matter of mere conpliment, and which militates not in the least gainst the name, or order, or distinguishing power of Bishops. For that Bishops came out of this LETTER. monastery of Hy, and went to other countries, is a certain as any thing can be in history: And this is so remarkable an event among the transchions of our old Scottish church, that it deserves to be taken particular notice of. The case was this, as related by Bede. It seems hulinus, who was one of Pope Gregory's original missionaries, and had been ordained Bishop of York in the kingdom of the Northumbrians, had spon the death of his favourite King Edwin, and the apoltacy of his successors Osrich and Eanfrid in 633, deferted his charge, and retired to the first converted country of Kent: Upon which Ofwald, who the next year succeeded to both these apostates, having been, when in exile upon the death of his father Edilfrid who was a pagan, baptized and educated among the Scots, made application to them for a Bishop to instruct and govern, or perform Episcopal offices among his sub-In return to this application, Segenius then Abbot of Hy, after one fruitless mission, sent a worthy man Aidan, who, by Oswald's permission took up his residence in Lindisfarne, a small island ever against Berwick, now called Holy-island, where he exercised his Episcopal function with treat fuccess and applause for seventeen years, and upon his death in 651, was succeeded by Finan, who was fent from the same monastery of Hy, and fat Bishop of Lindisfarne ten years. After him came Colman, who because of the disputes about Easter continued but three years, and then returned with the most of his clergy to his own country. Upon which the clergy of the Romish mission entered again into the Northumbrian church, and peaceably enjoyed the fruits of what

LETTER labours these three Bishops from Hy had bestows ed upon the people, whom, thirty years before, Paulinus had forsaken. This is a short abridge-Bed. Hift.] ment of this whole affair, which Bede has given fuch an ample narration of, and which, tho perhaps not immediately belonging to the particular history of our own church, is such a noble monument of the reputation and zeal of our forefathers, that I persuade myself every true hearted Scotsman will receive it with pleasure.

Yet, honourable as it is for our country, there are some among us, who put a very different construction on it, from what was intended by the original relater. They will not admit these three missionaries from Hy to have been Bishops, at least, they say, in the modern sense of the word. They will allow them the levelling titles of clergy, or ministers or teachers, which is the common stile generally used in treating of this subject.— But Bede, who is the fountain of all our knowledge in the affair, is more particular. He express. ly fays, that King Ofwald fent to the "majores " natu" of the Scots; meaning by the "majores " natu" not the old men with respect to age, who could be of no use to him in what he was wanting, but (in Tertullian's phrase, "feniores qui president," and indeed in current ecclesiastical ityle,) the venerable men who managed and prefided in such matters. To them the King sent, begging, "ut sibi mitteretur Antistes," that they would fend him, not ministers, or teachers in the plural number, but in the fingular, "Antistes," the word he always uses to signify a Prelate or Bishop, as appears by what he immediately adds, " ac-" cepit namque Pontificem Aidanum, the King " got Aidan a Pontifex," another distinguishing word for a Bishop, and a Bishop too of some LETTER eminence. Buchanan indeed, at the same time that he refers to Bede, tells us that the then Scottish King Donald sent teachers to Oswald, Buch. hist. and Boece before him had faid much the same, reg. 53. which, whatever defign either of them might lib. iz. have had, seems to alter the sense and weaken the force of Bede's expressions. For by his account, it is evident that it was not a teacher only, or one of the inferior clergy that Ofwald wished to have. His people were not altogether destitute of what affishance might be expected from me of this character. Paulinus, before his going away, had left in his church of York, a deacon James, whom Bede calls a truly ecclefiastic and Bed. lib. fi. holy man, and who, he fays, continued long after "by his teaching and baptizing, to rescue much "prey from the old enemy." But this Deacon could not mould or organize a church, with all the powers of his order, or holiness of his conrefation: And therefore Oswald wished to have one who could do this; an Antistes, a Pontifex, an Episcopus, all which high prelatical titles Bede gives to Aidan. Now it was to the Scots that Ofwald applied for one of this character. And how bould he, who came to them a Pagan of eleven years of age, and was made a Christian among them, have known any thing of the importance or secessity of such a character, if there had been no such character among them all the time he staid with them? It follows therefore, from the nature of King Oswald's request, and from the terms in which Bede expresses it, that the request was not to the Scottish King, who he knew, could not of himself grant it, but to the "majores natu," the proper persons, for a Bishop to inspect and ma-

VI. as he had seen done under all the christiani he knew any thing of. Accordingly Bede, where he knew as well what belonged to the Episcopal chracter, and was as much concerned for the honor of his own order of presbyters, as any man in he day, expressly calls Aidan and his two successors. Bishops, and says they ordained Bishops and Pressprences, called synods, in a word performed all the offices pertaining to that character, which any Bessel shop, antient or modern, ever performed. What more would an unprejudiced person require? But, say our objectors, who consecrated o made them Bishops? It might as well be asked who confecrated the three hundred and eighted Bishops, who were present at the first councils Nice? No doubt Bede, who was born within t few years of these three Scottish Bishops of Lindil farne, and in the bounds of what was once the jurisdiction, knew well enough the regularity their consecrations, tho' he has not specified the name of their confecrations. This is no more than what other approved church historians have don as to many, indeed most of the Bishops they spea of, who yet have been acknowledged to have bee Bishops in the strictest and most limited sense. Had Bede foreseen, or even suspected, that doub would at any time arise about the office and o der of Bishops in general, as distinguished from and superior to presbyters, he certainly would, he well could, have been more particular and fa in his accounts of three fuch famous men as A dan, Finan, and Colman, whom he still cal Bishops, and upon whom, notwithstanding for fingularities about them which he laments, 1 bestows the highest encomiums. But not to re altogether on this way of arguing, which yet LETTER might be thought conclusive enough against the objection, let us see whether we cannot make fomething out of Bede, which, if not a direct anfwer, may lead to a fair enough folution of the question. He tells us, that the mission of Aidan from Hy was in the year 634: Now both before and about, and after that time, we find him making mention of Bishops in a country which he calls Souland. Thus he tells us, that Laurence, who beceded Augustine in the see of Canterbury about the year 604, in conjunction with his two bethren Bishops Mellitus and Justus, wrote a letter to the Bishops and Abbots " per universam Bed. lib. ii.

"Scotiam," over all Scotland. And John, the cap. 4. faceflor of Pope Honorius, about the year 642 trected a letter to the Scottish Bishops, Presbyand Doctors, and mentioned five of their thops by name, viz. Thomianus, Columbanus, Ibid. Smanus, Chromanus, and Baithanus. Here then cap. 19. whave an account, and from Bede too, of Scotth Bishops cotemporary with Aidan and his fuccolors: Might not some of them have been the onfectators of the Bishops of Lindisfarne? 1. bow it is contended that these Bishops did not belong to us, but were Bishops in Ireland. me Usher had led the way to this piece of criticism: And after him, not only the frish and Lighth writers, but even some amongst ourselves in their quarrel with Episcopacy, have laid hold of this evalion as if it had been decisive. denied that Bede calls the island of Ireland the country of the Scots, and fometimes gives it the mme of Scotia, Scotland: But the letters, which has recorded, no where bear fuch a refluic-

LETTER tion.* And it is no less certain that he frequen ly speaks of the Scots being in Britain, and cal their British habitation likewise Scotia, or Sec Thus speaking of Ceollach, one of the Bishops whom the Scottish Bishop Finan had con fecrated for the Saxon kingdom of the Mercian he fays, "This Ceollach was of the nation of the " Scots: Who not long after, leaving the Epil " copate, returned to the island of Hy, when "the Scots have the capital and chief of many "monasteries," which he explains in another place by faying, "The second Bishop here was "Ceollach, who leaving the Episcopate returned cap. 24. " to Scotland, being himself a Scotsman." & likewife, in his account of the debate about Easter, he fays, " Colman feeing his doctrine and fol-" lowers despised, returned to Scotland to consult " with his own people what was to be done is Here I cannot but take notice of the partiality of the Ent Col. Hist. lish ecclesiastical historian Mr Collier, in his translation of Lan b. s. p. 8c. rence's letter, from Bede, where, among other things, Lauren tius says, " Scottos vero per Dagamum Episcopum in has quam superius memoravimus insulam, et Columbanum Abba . " tem in Gallijs venientem, n'hil discrepare a Britonibus in es " rum conversatione didicimus." Which literally, in Bede careless use of the preposition "in" with the accusative or able tive, runs, "We have learned by the Bishop Dagamus in the " forementioned island, and by the Abbot Columbanus comis " into Gaul, that the Scots differ in nothing from the Britons. But Mr Collier renders it, "by the Bishop Dagamus sailing is " to this island, and by the Abbot Columbanus, whom we m " with in France, &c." Making his readers believe, according to his own hypothesis, that the Scottish Bishop Dagamus belong ed to Ireland, from his being obliged to come into Britain ! fea, which Bede, whom he refers to, does not fay: Tho' eve if he had faid fo, it would not have fixed Dagamus to Irelan fince the Scottish island of Hy required failing into Britain, much as Ireland did.

"the affair." And what he means by Scotland LETTER here, he particularizes afterwards, "Colman " came first to the island Hy whence he had been -"fent to preach to the English." His general cap. 26. relation of this mission is all in the same strain. It was among the Scots that Ofwald was baptized: It was to the same Scots among whom he had been baptized, that he applied for a Bishop: It was from the island of Hy, which Bede owns belonged to Britain, that Aidan first, then Finan 1. iii. c. 3: and Colman were fent. Bede calls them Bishops, enginally belonging to, and receiving their chander in a Scotland in Britain: Coeval with them be speaks of other Scottish Bishops, and gives us the names of some of them. What reason can be found in all that he fays, for confining these other Bishops to Ireland, any more than the three who, be expressly says, belonged to and came from Hy in Scotland. Upon the whole then, we need be at no loss to account for the regularity of the confecration of these three Scottish Bishops of Lindisfarne, when we compare Bede's account of it, with his stile and manner in other parts of his valuable history, tho' he has not in so many words told us who the particular Bishops were tho bestowed this consecration upon them: And it clearly follows, that the then Scottish church, whether in Britain or Ireland, had Bishops in it, and was not fo averse from Episcopacy on the me hand, nor on the other hand so obscure and unknown in the neighbourhood, as different people with different views have imagined. by the Scottish church, whether in Britain or Ireand. For allowing Archbishop Usher and his copiers all that they can squeeze out of Bede in derogation of our British Scotland at that time,

O 2

LETTER yet when it is remembered what a weight of it fluence, if we must not call it superiority, th church or monastery, or college of clergy at H is faid to have had over the Northern Scots, in cluding the people in the North of Ireland, ar North-west parts of Britain, it must be acknow ledged that they were all of one communion, has all the same principles, exercised the same di cipline, and received the same form of ecclesia tic government: So that if the Northern par of Ireland, which were under the obedience what we may call the metropolis, at Hy, admi ted Bishops among them, we may conclude the me tropolis itself was not unfriendly to Episcopacy especially since we are as certain as we can be any thing, that the clergymen who were fent from it at three different times to form and govern the English church in Northumberland, were of the Episcopal order.

You will excuse this seeming digression from the historical part of my subject; and believe me,

Ever yours, &c.

VII.

LETTER VII.

Controversy between the Church of Rome, and the British Churches, about the keeping of Easter——Share of the Scottish Bishops of Lindisfarne in that Controversy——The Northumbrian King decides in favour of the Romish Party, and puts an end to the Scottish Mission.

ERHAPS it will be faid, there was no necessity for being at so much pains to prove, that the nissionaries from Hy were of the Episcopal order, nce it is yielded, that in their time, there was piscopacy among the Scots, brought in at first by he Romish missionary Palladius, under the preence of conveniency and decency, but afterwards reathed upon their necks, by the arbitrary force This is the fource of papal tyranny and ambition. of all that odium and contumelious usage which our Scottish episcopacy has had, I may say, the pecuhar misfortune to labour under. The injustice of it sufficiently appears even from this consideration, that at the period we are now looking back to, it acertain the Scots knew little of the mighty powa of the Church of Rome: Or, if they had begun to hear of it, they did not think themselves at all obliged to pay a blind obedience to it. For they

LETTER they differed from that Church in some point which however infignificant they may now appear were in those days considered as matters of im portance by both parties. They all agreed in 60 lemnizing an annual festival, called Easter or Pasch, in commemoration of our blessed Saviours refurrection. They knew that fuch a folemnity had been observed from the beginning; and the had devotion enough to feel the usefulness, if not the necessity, of celebrating such a glorious part of our Lord's history, by a particular day for apart for that purpose. But it appears that the church of Rome kept this festival of Easter upon one day, or rather according to one form of calculation, and the churches in Britain according to another. It is not very material to examine where the difference lay, or to take notice of the astronomical questions relative to that subject. The controversy had been long and hotly ma naged; and it is well known what a noise Pope Victor (the very Pope from whom, Boece says, we got our christianity,) made about it; to such a degree indeed as to excommunicate the Asiatic churches for differing from him in it. ference between the Roman and British churche about the observance of Easter, has been adduced as a proof that the churches in Britain had been founded by some of the disciples of St. John, be cause the Asiatic churches, in their contention with Rome, alledged the authority of this Apoftl for their practice: And Colman, the last of ou Scottish Bishops at Lindisfarne, in the samou dispute he had with the Romish clergy on the fubject, goes on the same footing of pleading S John's example: Tho' it does not appear, that in so doing, he had any good ground to go upor

the Asiatic churches observed their Easter LETTER the fourteenth day of the moon, whatever of the week it fell upon, whether on a Sunor not, and for that reason were called Quarimans, or Fourteenth-day-men: Whereas the In churches always kept it on a Sunday, as in many places affures us: For speaking of mba and his fuccessors in Hy, he says, hese men being placed as it were out of e world, and beyond the reach of having e synodical decrees about the Paschal obrvance notified to them, and trusting to erneous calculations for the time of this high stival, diligently practised such works of piy and chastity as they had learned out of e prophetic, evangelic, and apostolic writgs, but had a particular way of keeping East-: Which yet they celebrated not on the urteenth day of the moon, with the Jews, as me have thought, but always on the Lord's iy, tho' many times not in the proper week: or, as Christians, they knew that the Lord's furrection, which was accomplished on the ft day of the week, ought to be commemoted on that day: But being little better than de rustics, they had not learned to calculate hen that particular first day came." , speaking of Bishop Aidan, after having ex-I him for every good quality that adorns the opal character, and even attributed the gift uracles to him, he adds, "These things in is prelate I much approve and love, because am persuaded these things were pleasing to od: But that he did not observe Easter at ne proper time, either not knowing the caonical computation for it, or being overborn

LETTER " by the authority of his own church, from fo VII. " lowing that computation, if he knew it; this " I neither approve nor praise: Yet this muc "I approve, that, in his celebration of Easter "he commemorated, reverenced, and preaches " the fame that we do, namely, the redemp "tion of mankind by the passion, resurrection es and ascension of the one mediator between "God and man, the man Christ Jesus: And " therefore he kept his festival, not as some have " falfely thought, in imitation of the Jews, on the " fourteenth day of the moon, whatever day of " the week it fell on, but always on the Lord's " day from the fourteenth to the twentieth day L.iz. c. 17. " of the moon, &c." From this account of Bede's, it would appear that the Scottish clergy were falfely accused by their opponents of keeping up the erroneous practice of the old Quartodecimans, which had been condemned by the council of Nice. For Bede clears them from that imputation, and only laments their differing from the Roman church, to which he himself was a zeal ous adherer. How the old Britons and the Scot too should have first fallen into this peculia practice, it is not easy to say, from whateve quarter we shall derive their conversion. Asiatic practice, which, we are told, pled the authority of St. John and his disciples, differe widely from the British, more so indeed than the British ever did from the Roman: So this can no proof of our conversion from that quarte On the other hand, how shall we account for the difference on the supposition that we owe conversion to Rome? If, with Boece, we chu to go as high up as Pope Victor for it, it is n likely that a man fo tenacious of his own rite have neglected fuch a fair opportunity of LETTER them in the West, when he found he could it in the East. But you will fay, the Scots have forgot or departed from his instrucn the space of four hundred years that inned between him and the period I am ng of: And so indeed it might have hapif we had had no new communications Come all that time. But in this space we British Ninian converting the Southern Might not he have communicated to his ts the right knowledge of the Paschal soy, as Bede calls it, along with the other of the gospel; especially since, as Bede has s, he had been "Romæ regulariter fidem nysteria veritatis edoctus," regularly instructhe faith and mysteries of religion at Rome, may conclude, in this among the rest, which had so long laid such stress upon. We Palladius, a Roman Deacon, bred up at the a Celestine, who was as keen in maintenof his own opinions as Victor: What was lladius doing all the time it is said he was that he had not informed the believing Scots he proper and canonical time of celebrating thest solemnity of their religion? If, with ishop Usher, we renounce Palladius, and send to Ireland, it does not mend the matter: ither he, nor the great St. Patrick who came him, and had been taught at Rome too, any greater impression upon, or had any fuccess with the Irish in this point, than ottish preachers had with the Scots. res of Ireland used the same computation that surches of Britain used at the time of Augumission, and continued to do so for some

time

P

LETTER time after, till first the southern Irish were brough VII. in to the Roman practice by the admonitions Pope Honorius, and next, but many years afte Bed. lib. iii. their northern brethren too, by the persuasion cap. 3. the Scottish Abbot Adamnanus, who yet cou lib. v. not work upon his own clergy at Hy to lay asi. czp. 16. their o'd customs. It is furprising therefore the Bede should have represented these northern Ch flians as wanting, by reason of their situatic the means of knowledge about the proper time keeping Easter, when we are so sure of such mous teachers having been fent from Rome amo So that still the difficulty remains, how account for fuch a material difference in an aff which at that time both parties looked upon as great importance, and for many years stuck v€ pertinaciously to their own practice with regard in process of time, changed their former system and adopted a new calculation, as in their • nion more astronomical and exact. And that fur a change had been made in fact, tho' not in B tain, yet by the Roman church, has been prov to a demonstration by Archbishop Usher, and oth-Prim. c. 16. critics in these matters, who tell us, that when Patrick came to Ireland in the year 431, the R man church made use of the old cycle of 84 year which was called the Roman account, and was wit the British Churches went by; but some time the 6th century, and before Pope Gregory's time the Church of Rome took up the Alexandrian c cle of 19 years, as explained by Dionysius Exig us, and ever after directed their paschal comput tion by it. The churches in Britain and Irelan

Usher de

Book ii. P. 97.

Now the only way, I think, to folve this de culty, is by supposing that one of the parties h≥

had not heard of this alteration, and therefore ad-LETTER hered to their first supputation, which they had very probably been made acquainted with at their original conversion: And till Augustin came into Britain, we hear little or no notice of any jarring customs amongst them. But when once he got footing in Kent, and had erected magnificent churches under the patronage of fecular encouragement, he foon began to display a little of even the then Romish lustre, and to discover something of the school he had been bred in. Gregory his employer, we acknowledge, was a good man: But he was a Pope, and found his fee by some means or other possest of privileges and pre-emimences, which he either in conscience thought he could not, or notwithstanding all his humility would not part with. Accordingly he gave Augustin a jurisdiction over all the Bishops of Britain: And the missionary himself had inclination enough to improve the gift as far as he had time or opportunity. His behaviour to the feven British Bishops whom he invited to a conference, and whom he received fitting, discovered both his spirit and design, which he still manifested · further in his proposals to them: For fays he, "Tho' in many things you act contrary to our " practice, yea to the practice of the universal "church, yet if in these three things you be " willing (" mihi obtemperare," to obev me,) to " celebrate the paschal solemnity at a proper " time, to administer baptism after the manner " of the holv, Roman, and apostolic church, and " to preach the word of God along with us to " the English nation, all your other customs, " however contrary to ours, I will quietly put up " with." This is the first time we find any dif- Bed. lib. ii. Pa

LETTER ference or dispute about Easter. But August no doubt thought it necessary to have somethic to found his claim upon: And tho' in this mand he does not expressy mention the Pop donation, yet these old Bishops, who had been Britain before him, and had received their charter, thro' a continued succession of a long to of years, had as much fagacity as smell out design, and courage enough not to yield to For they resolutely tell him, as Bede has pressed it, "That they would do none of the things, nor receive him for their Archbisho-Which, from the pen of his admirer Bede, pl= ly discovers, that "to be their Archbishop" the main point he drove at. It is true he disappointed, notwithstanding the extent of pogiven him by the Pope, and his own unwear endeavours to improve it. His successor L rentius kept the same object in view, and is first who meddles with the Scots, tho' by strain of his own letter, little to his satisfacti For after paying them the compliment, that and his companions had judged the Scots to better minded than the Britons; that is, t had hoped the Scots would be more tractable th the Britons were likely to be, he adds, "I " now we perceive by the Bishop Dagamus, a " by the Abbot Columbanus, that the Scots c " fer nothing in their observations from the E " tons, for Bishop Dagamus coming to us " fused not only to eat with us, but even " ftay in the same house where we lodged." Here we see a complaint on the one hand, and reason assigned for it on the other. But we m believe Bishop Dagamus had ground for his sl

ness. He might have heard of Augustin's haus

s to his British brethren before, and might LETTER ily suspect Laurentius to have had the same s. It could not be only the difference of he might think, which these incomers were ry solicitous about: Something of more mohe feared might lie at the bottom, perhaps eriority or claim of pre-eminence which he his church had not been acquainted with ccustomed to: So he thought it best to stand , and rather be thought guilty of some deof incivility than run the risk of an affront. hear nothing more of this intercourse for than twenty years, till Pope Honorius took up the cause, and wrote to the Scottish n, exhorting them " not to think their small ndful in the utmost borders of the earth ser than all the rest of mankind, and not to ep a paschal solemnity of their own, contrary the calculations and fynodical decrees of the Bishops of the catholic church!" This , Bede tells us, had some effect upon the , as he calls them, in the Southern parts eland: But the rest of them still stood out: five or fix years after this, we find a letter, before observed, addressed to five Scottish ps by "Hilarius Archpriest, and keeping the ace of the holy apostolic see, John Deacon id in the name of God Elect, John Primiceri-, and keeping the place of the holy apostolic and John servant of God and counsellor of e same see," in which they still find fault their way of keeping Easter, and at the time warn them against the poison of Pelaism which they heard was breaking out aight them again. But this last part of the Bed. 1. fi. rge feems to have been mere suspicion, and cap. 19. only

Boeth. lıb. ix.

reg. 52,

LETTER only brought in to colour the principal defign of wheedling them into submission. It is true about this time, Boece tells us, that the Scottish King Ferchard was charged with Pelagianism. and with ridiculing baptism, and auricular con-Buch. hist. fession: And Buchanan to the same purpose says, "that among the crimes laid to Ferchard's " charge was the Pelagian herefy, and his con-"tempt of baptism and other sacred rites: Which, "when he could not clear himself of, he was "thrown into prison, where he put an end to "his own days." Perhaps Bede's account of the above letter from Rome may have given rife to this accusation against King Ferchard: And the Roman clergy would greedily lay hold of the least report this way, to be a handle to them to purfue the game which they had been in chafe of in Britain ever fince Augustin came into it. However, they would have been as well em-

> Their late Pope Honorius had been encouraging the feeds of the Monothelite doctrine, which made fuch a noise afterwards: And however much the Romanists may boast of the purity of their church, it is certain, that in the fixth General Council at Constantinople, Pope Honorius was condemned and anathematized: Which anathema his succesfor Leo II. confirms, with this further stigma upon him, "That instead of purifying this Apostolic "Church by the doctrine of the Apostles, he had

ployed in looking into their own matters at home.

" endeavoured to destroy the faith by a profane "herefy;" and to the same purpose, in his letter to the Bishops of Spain, he says, "The fixth Coun-" cil condemned Honorius, who, inflead of ex-

" tinguishing the flame of herefy in its birth, as

" belonged to the apostolic authority, did encon-

A. D.

" rage it by his negligence." On all which ac-LETTER cusations the Abbé Fleury has this remark; "So VII." much care did the Pope take to shew, that that " personal fault does no prejudice to the holy See." liv. 40. And might not the same be said of every other § 31. See? But this is what they always fly to, that whether their Popes can err or not, which they are not as yet agreed about, the holy see cannot be prejudiced; as if the orthodoxy of the see could be separated from the heterodoxy of the person who fills it. It is upon this maxim of their own. that the Roman clergy began so early to take so much upon them, and in their own names to dictate and lay down rules to other churches: Tho'. one should think, with no great colour of reason, even on admitting their own principles. For whatever title their Bishop might have to the care and government of the universal church, from his being the fuccessor of St. Peter, it will not follow that his presbyters and deacons are invested with that title too, and have the supreme authority deyolved upon them in every vacancy of the chair: And the deacon John, notwithstanding his election, might have waited the full completion of his powers, as heir to the prince of the Apostles, before he had meddled with directing and centuring Bishops, who, except in what the see of Rome has long been affuming, were never known to be thus treated by the inferior orders.

But to return from this digression, which yet is not quite incongruous to the business in hand. after this letter from the Roman clergy and their elect Pope, the matter in agitation feems to have lien dormant for some time, till in the year 664 it was wakened up again in the church of Lin-Bed. 11b. disfarne on the following occasion. The first cap. as.

Bishop

LETTER Bishop Aidan, who came from Hy to Lindi farne, had brought the rites and usages of his ow church along with him, and continued to pra tise them without any molestation, and even wit the love and veneration of his co-tempora: Bishops who differed from him, particularly Honorius of Canterbury, and Felix of the East Angles. His fuccessor Finan was not so lucky For he had debates upon the contended point with one Romanus, a Scot by birth, but who ha been bred in Italy, and brought over the Italiz customs to Britain with him. However, Finz stood his ground also, being, by Bede's account of him, a stiff man, and one who had been mus employed and very affiftant in planting church and fettling Bishops in many other parts of the Saxon dominions. But in the time of Colman who was fent from Hy upon Finan's death, a fre attack was made by the Romish party, which gave the finishing stroke to the Scottish missi in that quarter. Prince Alfred, King Oswi's € dest son, had for his preceptor a Priest Wilfriwho had been educated at Rome, and on his r turn to his own country, full of the splendor ar rites of the Romish church, got the young prinbrought over to his way of thinking. At the joint instigation, the old King, who till now he neither defired nor known any other way th≥ that in which he had been baptized and instruted among the Scots, was prevailed upon to ca a fynod for the discussion of this controversy,: the monastery of Strenechal, where Hilda, a lad > meeting came, on the Romish side, Agilbert Bishop of the West-Saxons, with one of his Pre bytes

> of royal parentage, was Abbess, and had all-:

long adhered to the Scottish usages.

rs Agatho, the Priest Wilfrid, Romanus who LETTER. contended with Bishop Finan, and the old VII. on James, whom Paulinus had lest behind thirty years before. On the Scottish side Colman and his clergy, and Cedda, one of isshops whom Finan had ordained, and who as interpreter to the meeting. Here King, after having prefaced that "they who all pect the same heavenly kingdom, should not fer in the celebration of the heavenly sacramts, but should inquire after the true trains, but should inquire after the true trains, and follow it," desired his own Bishop an to explain the nature and origin of the which he and his church had so long prac-

When Colman had finished what he had , the King defired Agilbert to do the fame is side of the question next: But Agilbert a foreigner, and not expert enough in the 1 language, begged that the Priest Wilfrid t be allowed to speak in his stead. It is ess to repeat the feveral proofs and authoproduced on both fides, of which Bede has us a very full and distinct detail, but which examination, will not be found fo folid or grounded as their producers no doubt ima-It is enough to fay, that Colman alledged xample of St. John, and Wilfrid the authof St. Peter, with this farther advantage of reo Colman's allegation, that the Scottish form eping Easter always on a Sunday could not the example of St. John, who, in condeion to the Eastern Jews, is faid to have obd the fourteenth day of the moon, whether Il on a Sunday or not. In conclusion, afaving complimented Colman's fathers, that if had been taught the catholic computation, LETTER they would have followed it as carefully, as the VII. did the other commandments of God which the whad learned, Wilfrid fays to Colman, "But " you and your adherents, if after having her "the decrees of the apostolic see, yea, of t " whole church, and these too confirmed by scr "ture, you refuse to obey them, you certain " are guilty of fin. For allowing your fath to have been holy men, is their small har " ful in a corner of a remote island to be co es pared to the church of Christ over the who " earth? And great as that Columba of you " may have been, is he to be preferred to t " bleffed prince of the Apostles, to whom t " Lord faid, Thou art Peter, and upon this ro " will I build my church, and the gates of h " shall not prevail against it; and, To thee wil " give the keys of the kingdom of heaven." The determined the point: For now the King, aft having asked Colman whether he acknowledg that all this was faid to St. Peter, and if the li was ever faid to Columba, to which he could I but know what answers the honest man wou give, (" ita conclufit," fays Bede,) decided thu And I fay unto you, that as this is the porte "I will not contradict him, but in as far as " know and am able, will in all things obey l " flatutes, lest when I call at heaven's gate, the " be none to open to me, if the porter be r "enemy." On this fecular decision of the d ference, Colman with most of his clergy return to Hy, whence he had been fent three years t Bach. Hist. fore, and where, according to Buchanan, we fi Lib. v. in him four years after this, like a good Bisho R. 54. prohibiting the nobles from punishing, as he ca it, K. Ferchard II. for his crimes, and even co forting that unhappy man on his repentance in LETTER his last moments. At this meeting too the affair of the tonfure, or form of shaving the crown of the head, was debated, the Romanists having one fashion of it, which, like all their other peculiarities, they pretended to have learned from St. Peter, and the Scottish churches another fahion, which, because different from theirs, the Romanists gave out, had been used by Simon Magus. These may be said, and justly too, to have been but very trivial and insignificant matters: But we see what stress was laid upon them: And we cannot think that the church of Rome would have been so often and strenuously labouring to enforce a conformity in these points, if it had not been with a view to make such conformity a leading step to the introduction of their long projected supremacy.

I am, yours, &c.

LETTER

0 4

VIII.

₹^1 21

LETTER VIII.

Instances of Arrogance in the Church of Romethe Pictish and Scottish Churches at last con with the Romish Customs—and for some I sink into Obscurity.

OR some time after the expulsion of the Stish Bishops from Lindisfarne, and subst tion of Wilfrid, and the Romish party in the room, we find the Scottish clergy often loo down upon with a contemptuous and maligr eye. In the year 668, there was one Theodo a Greek by birth, sent over from Rome to the of Canterbury, who being a man of spirit, well as of confiderable learning, was at great p to enforce obedience to the see of Rome, and cording to Bede, was the first Archbishop, whom all the English church submitted. He l several councils; abrogated, or confirmed the dinations of Bishops, and towards the end of life, composed a Penitential, or collection of can for the regulation of penance, which, Fleury f was the first of that kind that the Latin chr had. In one of the capitula of this piece it is pointed, "that the Scottish and British Bish

Bed. lib.iv.

who differted from the catholic church in the LETTER "tonsure, and keeping of Easter, were to have VIII. "their character confirmed by receiving impois it appears that the Scots still kept to their Councils, i form, notwithstanding of Wilfrid's arguints, and K. Ofwi's change of opinion: And ile it discovers the Roman pride and arroice, it is fo far lucky for the Scots, that they thus classed with the Britons, who, we are e, from their first conversion had regular hops among them: Which is another strong fumption in favour of my original supposition, at the Scots had received their first knowledge christianity from the Britons, by their thus hering to the British rites, and being, in conaction with them, exposed to the overbearvanity of the Romish church.

It was about this time that Adamnanus, Abbot Hy, whom Bede calls a good and wife man, done who was well instructed in the knowige of the scriptures, having been sent on an Bed. lib. v. shaffy to the Northumbrian court, and seen the cap. 16. w rites which had been lately introduced inthat church, was so well pleased with them, at on his return home, he endeavoured all he nld to introduce them likewife among the clerof the obedience of Hy. But in this it feems ecould not succeed: So tenacious as yet was E Scottish church of their old, and as they lought, primitive usages, and so scrupulously haid of any innovation, however inconsiderable a itself, which might tend to the infringement their ancient independence, that neither the persuasions nor commands of one of their superiors,

However they began by degrees to bend a li

LETTER riors, and him a worthy man too, could pre VIII. with them.

Ibid.

from their former stiffness, and the repeated 1 citations which they met with at last carried point. In the year 710, Ceolfrid Abbot of W mouth where Bede was Monk, wrote a le letter in defence of the Roman tonfure and I ter to Naitan King of the Picts. In which, amo the many other arguments and illustrations of fubject which the good Abbot advances, he fers the following symbolical explication of paschal solemnity, which is by no means a c temptible one. "We are commanded to k "the pasch in the first month of the year, to st " us that the spirit of our minds ought to " renewed to the love of heavenly things, in " der to our duly celebrating the mysteries of " Lord's refurrection and of our deliverance: 1 " are commanded to keep it in the third we " to testify that the Christ who was promised " fore the law and under the law, did in "third age of the world graciously come to "the passover sacrificed for us, and that by " rising from the dead on the third day after " facrifice of his passion, he designed this day " be henceforth called the Lord's Day, and " refurrection to be yearly commemorated uj And we then do truly celebrate this " chal folemnity, when thro' faith, hope and c " rity, these three, we study to make our pai "i. e. our passage out of this world with " Christ to the Father. We are commanded " wait for the first full moon after the equin " when the fun is beginning to make the " longer than the night, and the moon ready " pre " present her fully enlightened orb to the earth, be- LETTER " cause the sun of righteousness, in whose wings is VIII. " healing, the Lord Jesus, did first by the triumph " of his refurrection dispel the darkness of death, " and then ascending into heaven, did fill his church, " the moon, with the light of internal grace by " the gift of his holy spirit. Whoever therefore " will contend that the full moon of the paschal " season can be before the equinox, such a per-" fon dissents in the celebration of the highest " mysteries from the doctrine of the scriptures, " but agrees with them who trust they can be " faved without the preventing grace of Christ, "and who are not ashamed to teach that, tho" " the true light had not by his death and refur-" rection overcome the darkness of the world, " mankind might have attained to perfect righte-"outnets." In recommending the Roman form of the clerical tonfure, he acknowledges to the King, "that the Apostles were not all shaven " after one and the same way, neither has the ca-"tholic church, tho' agreeing in one faith, one * hope and one charity, ever adopted one uni-" form tonfure: And to own the truth, this dif-" ference 'of shaving cannot hurt those who have "a pure faith in God, and a fincere love to their " neighbour, especially since we do not read of " any controversy in the church upon this score, "as there was about the catholic faith and the "keeping of Easter." Yet he goes on to press the use of the then Roman fashion from the common topic of St. Peter's example, which is the great confirmation, tho' a very uncertain one, of most of the Romish rites to this day: And he concludes thus, "Wherefore, fir, I admonish " your prudence, that you should in all points

LETTER " strive to observe these things in the unity VIII. " the catholic and apostolic church, along wi "the nation over whom the King of Kings as "Lord of Lords has placed you: That fo, a ter having finished the time of your earth " power, the bleffed prince of the Apostles hin " felf may willingly open to you and yours, wit " all the rest of the elect, the gates of the king "dom of heaven." This letter had the desire effect. The same argument, it seems, that has converted King Oswi, had the like weight with King Naitan. For now, fays my author, the King fent proper persons thro' all the provinces of the Picts to transcribe, learn, and teach the cycle or nineteen years, laying aside every where the ok erroneous one of eighty four. The Monks too and Ministers of the altar had their heads shaved in the new form: "And thus the nation being cor " rected, submitted themselves as it were to " new discipline, under the blessed prince of the "Apostles, and heartily rejoiced in his patron " age."

Here then was one part of what is now Scotland, and at that time no inconsiderable part of it, gained over to a new obedience, as Bed calls it. The other part was brought over no long after. For in the year 716, the Scots who belonged to the monastery of Hy, and had the now maintained their ground against different at tacks from different quarters, were at last prevailed on by the Saxon priest Egbert, to come is to the current practice, and join with the rest of the world, as they were made to believe, in of uniform observance of facred things. This Est bert had, about twenty years before this, forms a resolution to go over to the continent of Ge preach the gospel to some of the hea- LETTER ons there, but was prevented by a rerom heaven, which told him "that he ed to go to the monasteries of Columba's Bed. l. v. ition, and bring them into the right way, ratra eorum non recte incedunt, because oloughs do not go right." Accordingly came out of Ireland, where he had long l, into Hy, of which place Dunchadus me was Abbot: And there, fays Bede, 15, cap. 23? t them to celebrate the high paschal fesr the catholic and apostolic manner, and ie proper figure of the coronal tonfure: h certainly was brought about by a wondispensation of the divine goodness, that e the Scots, who had the knowledge of vine truth, had willingly and without ing communicated it to the English peohey themselves should by the means of nglish people, be afterwards brought to e perfect rule of life in some things in they were deficient: Whereas the Briwho would not impart what knowledge had of the christian faith to the Angles. vhen these Angles were believers, and enconformable to the catholic rule, remainan inveterate aberration from the right and pretended to keep the christian soties without the fociety of the christian This man of God Egbert lived after hirteen years in the island of Hy, which ssecrated to Christ by enlightening it with n new bleffings, and with the grace of ectical unity and peace." w we see the complete change wrought;

Its and Scots united in usage and obedience

LETTER ence, with the Saxon church, and laying aside th VIII. traditions they had received from their original converters, from Palladius, Ninian, Columba, &c. to embrace a fet of forms and fashions from Rome. under profession indeed of catholic unity, but with a view, which perhaps they did not suspect at first, to lead them by degrees into an absolute fubjection. In confequence of this revolution in the affairs of our old church, we find in five years after this, a Pictish Bishop Fergustus, and a Scottish one Sedulius, attending a synod at Rome under Pope Gregory II. probably to testify their lately embraced communion, and according to the current of devotion at that time, to visit "limi-" na Apostolorum" the thresholds of the Apostles, especially of the prince of the Apostles, from whom they were taught to expect fuch mighty fayours, and whom therefore it would be fo danger> ous to disoblige. I have been the more tedious in my account of this fo much agitated controverly between our predecessors and the Romish party, on purpose to filence, if possible, that foolish clamour raised by a certain class of writers, that Palladius brought in Popery. They know little certain about Palladius, farther than that he was fent the first Bishop to the believing Scots, and all the strong things that have been faid for or against him, are but empty declamations without authority, and consequently below credit. To say therefore that he brought in Popery, is a mere rant of prejudice and effrontery: They might as well fay he brought in Mahometanism. Or if it can be sup posed that he was the planter of Popery among us, it appears to have been but very weakly root ed under his hand, as it took fuch a long tract of tim to make any great figure. Between the LETTER ion of Palladius and the above related con-VIII. on by Egbert, were near three hundred years. our church popish all this time, when it is in they knew little of the Pope as fuch, and, rhat they did know of him, or were ordered im, continued to diffent from him in fundry is which he thought of no small consequence? Bishop Dagamus popish, when he would not uch as lodge in the fame house with the h missionary Laurentius? Was Bishop Colpopish, who gave up his charge, and a charge which he had executed for some years with t applause, rather than comply with a few ices brought from Rome, and recommended ie example, and under the authority of St. r? They certainly know little what popery is, would suspect such people of it. The great linal Baronius, who beyond all question was a ljudge in this matter, feems to have been different opinion: For he charges both the s and Britons with the guilt of schism, for deng from the church of Rome in these par-Baronars. It is very hard therefore that these old ann. 604. ops of our church should be accused of popery sea. 78. he adversaries of Episcopacy, and at the same branded with schism by a popular Cardinal. vever, as Baronius will not allow them to : been papists, that is to fay, in subjection ie Pope, and thereby clears them from the yterian imputation, so the great character the popish Bede, a co-temporary and conently a creditable writer, bestows on them, hidates the Cardinal's charge against them, discovers to us this fundamental truth, that hose days the Pope or Bishop of Rome was \mathbf{R}_{2}

LETTER not universally looked upon as the necessary cen VIII. tre of communion, but every national church was an organized body within itself, under the govern-ment of its own Bishops, and independent of any foreign jurisdiction whatever. If it shall still be urged, as has often been done by certain writers, that Episcopacy itself, or any degree of superiority among the Ministers of Christ's church, is what they mean by Popery, they would do well to remember, that this is not only a begging of the question, which is never allowed in disputation, but is likewise paying Popery a higher compliment than they would wish, by making it coeval with Episcopacy: Since it is certain that Bishops, as superior to Presbyters, whether that be an encroachment or not, were in the church at too early a period for supposing her corrupted to fuch a deep degree as the present idea of Popo ry implies.

I acknowledge indeed, that Egbert's fuccess with the Scottish clergy, in bringing them over to a conformity to the Roman ulages, did oper a door for introducing their dependence upon and subjection to the Roman See. And if this be what is properly called Popery, as it certainly is, and nothing less deserves that title, I would here ask a natural question, which appears on the face of this piece of History, as related by Bede By what instruments this change was effectuated and Popery brought in? We have heard of: time when it was made an argument in fayour the Presbyterian model of Church governmen and an argument too not confined to private d bate, but formally and publicly prefented to the Wisdom of the Nation, " That this church was r " formed from Popery by Presbyters." It is n befo me as yet to enter into the merits of this LETTER nor to try the truth or force of this alle-. I only wish that those who trust to it, look back to the era of our ecclesiastic I am now confidering, and they will fee if Popery was thrust out by Presbyters, it rought in by Presbyters at first. It was a ter Wilfrid, and a turbulent one too, who atroduced it, in opposition to Bishop Colat Lindisfarne: It was a Presbyter Ceolfrid, rheedled the Pictish church into it: It was a ter Egbert, who wrought the Reformation, le calls it, among the Scottish clergy at Hy. men had been educated abroad, had imforeign principles, and had Presbyterian enough to spread these principles as far as ould at home, not only without the conice of, but even in direct contradiction to the tive Bishops. I do not, for my own part, uch stress upon this parallel, however simimay appear in fundry other particulars: I point it out, to let people see, how fallacious idation precedents are, to build upon, when are not warranted by proper authority or ive institution. m this period, so very remarkable in our :h-history, we have not much distinct intellifor some years, concerning the Scottish cler-Their differing from, and opposition to the n usages had made them conspicuous for time; as long as the church of Rome ht it worth her while to take notice of on account of the ends she had in view to ined upon them. But when that end was gained, it seems they had lost their impor, and sunk by degrees, along with many churches, into that shade of obscurity and in-

LETTER infignificance, which the grandeur of their ne VIII. mother and mistress church threw over the Yet, from what little knowledge we have got these subsequent times, it would appear that t Scots, notwithstanding their concessions and fu mission to the church of Rome, still retain. fomething of the old Anti-papal leaven, and u on that account were many times not well looke upon by the flatterers of the Roman power. about the year 747, we find a Scotsman Clemen contending with, and harraffed by, the Popill Fleur. hist. missionary Boniface, Archbishop of Mentz. Arch bishop Spotswood mentions one Samson, as engaged in the same cause, and finding fault with Bonib.i. p. 20. face for making it his business to win people to the obedience of the Pope, more than to the obedience of Christ, and endeavouring to establish an absolute sovereignty in the Pope's person over all the rest of the christian church. For this so capital error, in conjunction with some other fictitious articles, thrown in to make up the fum total of guilt, Clemens was condemned both at Mentz and Rome, tho' what became of him afterward, o how the affair ended, we know not. A long time after this, we meet with another instance of difrespect thrown upon the Scots in genera by their neighbour church, the now complete Popish church of England, and an instance to which fome people would be improving into argument that the Scots even then had no Bisho] among them. In the year 816, a fynod was he at Calcuith in England, the fifth canon of which ordains, "that no Scottishman shall be allowed

Eccles. ad 747. Ch. Hist.

Coll. Hift. Book ii. P. 149.

> "to baptize, read divine fervice, administer the " eucharist, or perform any part of the face "dotal office, because it is uncertain wheth

" or by whom they are ordained."

dec

an ill-looking infinuation; yet it can be easi- LETTER counted for. It does not express any belief in inglish synod, that the Scots had no bishops, therefore performed their ordinations by prers, which, if such had been the case, would been peremptorily assigned as the reason. only defign of it had been to prevent impo-, by keeping up to the ancient form of creal letters; tho' it might also have proceeded fome refentment in Wilfrid, then Archbishop nterbury, and president of the synod, who, all his Romish predecessors, would have had cottish bishops to receive consecration from as their metropolitan, and therefore on refusal did by this canon inhibit them from rming any acts of the facerdotal office withprecincts. In any shape this unneighbourocedure of the English church is no more of of the want of Bishops among the Scots, such a canon, past in a synod of the Galli-Bishops against the present English clergy. d be, that the French believed the church ingland admitted ordination by Presbyters nut Bishops.

I am, &c.

LETTER IX.

LETTER IX.

View of Church Affairs abroad—Account of general Councils—The Worship of Images e blished in the Romish Church—opposed Charlemagne—Liberality of that Prince to See of Rome—Foundation of the Papat Godeur—Observations on the Characters of primitive Bishops.

In the preceding letter, we have seen the Stiss church bending a little from her for stisses, and for the sake of peace and unity forming to the Romanists in some lesser mat But it does not appear that our clergy wer yet so thoroughpaced in their obedience, o completely popish as the partizans of Rome w have had them. We are now approaching most remarkable epoch in the public made both of our church and state; I mean the on of the two hitherto separate monarchies Pictish and the Scottish, in the person of Scottish King, Kenneth Macalpin. After this portant and desirable junction, which took about the middle of the ninth century, our a flical, as well as civil, begin to put on a LETTER t appearance from any thing we have yet IX. And therefore, before I enter on the conon of this new scene, I shall lay before ew observations on what we have already 1, which if not necessarily connected with, serve to illustrate my main design, and little more light on those dark ages we seen contemplating.

ll be proper therefore, that we now step a ut of our own confined island, and take of the state of church-affairs abroad, to e can discover any agreement or disagreebetween our Christian ancestors, whether r Picts, and the other branches of the Ca-Thurch in different parts of the world. der to this, I need not go fo far back as to liest ages of primitive purity: For these lays were over, before our progenitors here uch heard of. Nay, the two first general s, (that of Nice against the impugners of A.D. 3256 deity, and that of Constantinople against A. D. 381. mies of the Holy Ghost) were both held, we have any documents of our conversion n be relied on.. The famous passage of is the first notice we have from any anr creditable writer, of the Scots being be-: And this author was co-temporary with rd general council which was held at s in the year 431, against the Patriarch stantinople, Nestorius, who maintained the and unintelligible notion of "Two per-' in Christ: A notion indeed which, after noise that was made about it, and notnding of the many followers which its auad in the East, who are called Nestorians day, feems upon a thorough examination,

LETTER to have had more of nonsense than malice in However, as unguarded zeal oft leads people Yond the mark, so here a sierce opposition to 🗨 whimfical conceit foon produced another a more dangerous error. For in the year 451, general council was affembled at Chalcedon gainst the Abbot Eutyches, who had been or of the bitterest prosecutors of Nestorius, and i order to combat his doctrine of the two perfo nalities, had taught, that, as there is but one perfon in Christ, so there is but one nature too. contention was warmly carried on by both parties, and raifed more diffention and animofity in the Eastern church, almost down to the present times, than any other difference of opinion that had ever been in it. But we do not find that this flame had reached, or at least spread itself much in our The only infection of bad doctrine with island. which the churches here appear to have been charged, was an attachment to the tenets of our countryman Pelagius, who made a noise about the beginning of the fifth century, and was accused of magnifying the powers of man's will, and diminishing the necessity of God's grace. Yet we have no certain accounts of the sentiments of the British churches on that subject, farther than that two Bishops, Germanus and Lupus, came over from France to preach against it. Our own historians indeed tell us, that Palladius was fent to combat this herefy, which had begun to infest the Scottish But for this they have produced no competent authority. Prosper says no such thing, in any place where he speaks of Palladius: He only mentions in his Chronicle, that "at the instance

" of the Deacon Palladius, Pope Celestine sent Germanus into Britain, to confute the Pelagi-

" ans."

s." But no antient writer has the least hint LETTER Palladius found Pelagianism among the Scots: IX. only inferred from some distant accusations we find in the above quoted letters from the , and which, if we consider all the circums and principal design of the writers, ought be admitted as a sufficient proof against But to go on: In the year 553, the fifth al council was called at Constantinople, about ndemnation of three old Bishops, who had lead many years before, and who till then een well thought of in the church, Theodo-Mopfuesta, Theodoret of Cyrus, a celebratsurch-historian, and Ibas of Edessa. ous affair, in which the then Pope Vigilius quently and grossly prevaricated, got the of the "Three Chapters," and created much and contention in the West for a long but does not feem to have been much heard Britain. Only we are told that the Abbot banus, who is believed to have been a ıman, but was at that time refiding in Italy, Dr Macka letter in the year 607 to Pope Boniface IV. cnz. Lives, it, in which he openly calls Vigilius an he-vol i. for his scandalous behaviour in it. general council was also at Constantinople : year 680, against the Monothelites, who a flip from the Eutychian root, and mainthat, in confequence of the One Nature, eviour had but One Will and one operation: either does it appear that the churches in a had much knowledge of, or concern in ontroverly, which, tho' at its first appeart was favoured by Pope Honorius, seems to been for the most part confined to the East consequences, which were violent enough

2 for

IX. a Pope Martin, who was banished by the Emperor or in the year 655 for his opposing the Monothelites, and died in exile.

At this time the Eastern church was in a state of great desolation. The grand impostor Mahomet had started up about the year 620, and in less than fixty years his followers had subdued Arabia, Chaldea, Syria, Palestine, Phenicia, and Egypt, so that the christians in these countries, were in a miserable condition, and the outward peace of the church entirely destroyed. This inundation of the Mahometans by degrees brought on that ignorance and neglect of study which has fo fadly overwhelmed the Eastern church even to this day. Indeed the effects of it foon began to appear upon many occasions, particularly at the next general council, according to the Popilli reckening, which was held where the first had been, at Nice, in the year 787, and is by the church of Rome called the fecond council of Nice. Here it was that the foolish and dangerous fancy of worshipping images got the first sanction from any fort of authority, entirely owing, 28. the most impartial of the Popish writers themselves confess, to the incapacity which these fathers la-boured under, of distinguishing genuine writings from fabulous legends, and to their want of attention to some of the most substantial arguments proposed by their opponents. At the same time it is univerfally agreed, that the images then used in fome churches, and consequently recommended by this council, were but flat paintings or pictures, not, as is the practice now, folid pieces of statuary work, which by degrees came afterwards to be used. However this decision, such as it was whed in the East with great rigour, and con-LETTER by Pope Adrian, who was a zealous stickr it, met with long and learned contradicn the West. By the direction of the then of France, Charlemagne, who was after-Emperor, an elaborate confutation of it was 1 in the year 789, known by the name of roline Books: And not fatisfied with this. five years after, the same monarch conveennumerous affembly of the Bishops of Germarance, and Spain, in order to condemn it, nt over their sentence to the British Bishops eir approbation, which, the English histo-Collier. tell us, they very fully and cordially gave. b. 2.p. 139. activity of Charlemagne, in so strenuously opa papal decree in a religious point, at the time that he was befriending and supportle Popes fo much in temporal matters, has n the Popish writers into a great strait how oncile two fuch jarring pieces of behaviour, we the Emperor's credit, which, had it not for his usefulness to them in other respects, would not have been at so much pains to Their great defence is, that he and his s mistook the Eastern council's meaning, magined that the fathers at Nice had injoin-: highest degree of worship, which the mo. Papists call Latria, to be paid to images. ranting this to have been the case, tho' very bable, it shews at least either the incapacity accuracy of these Nicene image-worshippers, at drawing up their fynodical decree, which proposed to be binding on the whole church, ch plain and intelligible terms as to be liable o mistake, especially in such a material point ifference as they are pleased to assign between LETTER the several degrees of religious worship. It this Charlemagne who, it is faid, made that mous league with our Scottish King Achai which fo long subsisted between the two natio Whatever be in this, it is certain there was that time a great friendship between them: A as Charles appears to have had this image-aff deeply at heart, we may suppose he would wi to the Scots as well as to the British about It may also be supposed that the Scots would adhis fentiments, especially when coinciding w the fentiments of their neighbouring Bishops, a cerning it. To strengthen which supposition, it be observed further, that at this time our tion produced two very conspicuous men, w were graciously received by this monarch, very useful to him, an Albinus, (not the gr Alcuin, Charles's preceptor, who was an Engli

Lives, v. 1.

Dr.M.ken. man) and a Clemens. The first of these wr the Caroline books, and founded the univerl of Pavia, and the other taught the first put school in Paris: From which we learn that church was now beginning to emerge out of scurity, and to appear in other parts of the wo with that esteem and respect by which her lea ed men were so deservedly distinguished, even the subsequent ages of ignorance and corruption

Here too I cannot but present to your not an obvious reflection on the difference between the conversions in the early times, and those t were afterwards effected by the interpolition of cular power. The first were flow and fure: I others more rapid, but less durable. Of this history of Charlemagne, compared with the nals of primitive antiquity, affords a striking monstration. The compulsion which he put on the Saxons by the force of his arms, and the LETTER terror of his victories, drove vast numbers of them into a temporary profession of the Christian faith, under the incompatible alternative of being either baptized or butchered. And what was the confe-The poor creatures, as foon as his fword was out of their fight, ran back to their old idols: And the enraged conqueror had no help but come upon them again, and punish their apostacy, as he called it, with bloodshed and devastation. But was this the proper or primitive way of planting the religion of Jesus? No certainly: the gothel was first spread, and churches were long and successfully planted, not by force, but against it. The great Author of our faith fought no exterior affiliance of this kind: his own divine influence, and the intrinsic merits of his cause, were sufficient for the work; and thro' these it prospered amazingly. The preachers of the gospel then, with great patience, and under terrible hardships, made offer of the doctrines of falvation to the heathen nations. The people heard the glad tidings, and were by degrees convinced of the truth and importance of them: And this rational conviction, firengthened and sanctified by celestial grace, left fuch impressions on the minds of mankind, as were folid and lasting. Such was the original method of publishing the religion of Christ: a method. chosen by All-seeing Wisdom, supported by Almighty Power, and, which is an argument of no little weight with some people, approved by most extensive and incomparable success. It was not till the zeal of Christians began to cool; till their dependence on the great Captain of their falvation feemed to be shaken, that he permitted the powers of the earth to interfere, and left his church

ELETTER to the arm of flesh, when he saw her beginning to IX. weary of him and his arm. I fay, permitted: Fo I can never be brought to think, that he actually defigned or ordered it. The nature of his infti tutions, and the plan upon which he founded his church, do not lead to fuch a thought. And the consequences of the change wrought by the Em peror Constantine, however agreeable to flesh and blood, are not fuch as would have made the primitive martyrs fond of it. I know this is an unpopular topic, and not fuited to the general talk of the times. The great Constantine, the first Christian Emperor, as he is triumphantly called is almost an idol of veneration; and neither my fubject nor my inclination lead me to derogate from that respect which is justly due to his me mory.

But whatever esteem I may have for Constant tine, either from private opinion, or in compli ance with prevailing custom, I cannot go the same lengths with the hero of my present consideration the first German Emperor Charlemagne. Romanists, I know, make much of him, and I de not wonder at it. He was the first founder of their temporal grandeur. The old donation of Con stantine to Pope Sylvester, which they once built fo much upon, and which was in credit with then as far down as the days of our Fordun, who give Scotichron a copy of it at full length, has long fince been discovered to be an arrant forgery, and is not treated by the most of themselves as a ridiculou fable. They have what they think a better plea is support of their right to the possession of the temporalities and privileges which they have not so long enjoyed. For the donations made by Pe pin and his fon Charlemagne are incontestible, an ibt gave to the see of Rome as much right LETTER se possessions as these princes could give. none of my business to inquire what right ad, or how they came by it. I can only hat is well known, that the donations I entioned put the Bishops of Rome upon footing, as made them able to act in the tile they afterwards assumed. For, tho' s, as we have feen, contended a good deal he worship of images with Pope Adrian. rried himself very modestly and softly tothe Emperor in this affair, yet the tempower now put into the Pope's hands enabled cessors in time coming to inforce any docor decree which they might think proper pt or publish. Nay, the very right of conthe election of the Pope, which Charles erved to himself, and Adrian had solemnly to him, as an equivalent, and but a reasonad customary one, for the lands thus given was foon contended by the fucceeding and became in process of time the greatrce of uneafiness to the Emperors, till in lit was entirely and for ever wrested out · hands.

lib. ii. c. 48.

erto the Popes had been struggling, someatiently, sometimes with reluctance, under the of temporal subjection, not only to heanut even to Christian Emperors, and were doin the same lot of distress or oppression the secular powers with other Bishops. As me as the end of the sixth century, we find the Gregory, one of the greatest and best that led the Papal chair from Constantine's time day, acknowledging this subjection, and his letters, as other subjects then did, by

30. 32.

LETTER the years of the reign of his Lord and Master th Emperor Mauritius. This practice was kept u makes for fome time after, notwithstanding the title of Bed. lib. i. Universal Bishop, which it is said a Boniface, wh 24. 28. 29. came after Gregory, got from the bloody tyras Phocas, as we see in a letter from Pope Honoric A. D. 633. to Honorius of Canterbury. But about the begin Bed. lib. ii. ning of the eighth century, when the Imperia power was declining in Italy, by the frequent ir ruptions of the Lombards, and other barbarou nations, and a contest had arisen between the Popes and the then Emperor Leo Isaurus, about images, the Pope Gregory the second, but unlike the first, took the advantage of the Emperor's weakness, and by his perfuasions and influence withdrew the greater part of Italy from their alle giance. His immediate successors went on in the fame strain, and finding the Kings of France of the Merovingian race, a continued fuccession for fome time of indolent, inactive men, they chimed in so far with the ambition of the first ministers of state, Charles Martel and his son Pepin, that at last the Pope formally deposed King Childeric, and fet up Pepin in his room: For which good turn, Pepin first, and then his fon Charlemagne, could do no less than make war upon the Lombards at the Pope's defire, tho' thefe people were at that time Christians, and give to St Peter, a the Popes termed it, the lands which their victo rious arms had torn from the Lombard princes This is such a stretch, without warrant and against precedent, of papal privilege, that the more mo derate of that party in modern times are begin ning to be ashamed of it. For tho' three grea Cardinals, Baronius, Bellarmine, and Perron have upon the faith of the old historians, admitted th and done what they could to justify the LETTER ness of it from the principles of their church, late writer in Lewis the Fourteenth's time, alis Alexander, Professor of Theology in the fity of Paris, thinks proper to deny both ope's withdrawing Italy from the Emperor's ince, and changing the regal succession in e, from this main argument, which he lays as conclusive against the three Cardinals, se Popes then were too good men to be of fuch actions. This differtation of Fa- Hist Eccl. Mexander's came out at a time when there Szc. VIIIot work between the King and the Pope their feveral powers and prerogatives, and esigned as a distant fort of vindication of the an liberties both in church and state. But rer favourable the attempt certainly was to rional character of the Popes, yet as it was licial to their pretentions, it was condemned decree of Pope Innocent XI. in the year , and a prohibition issued against reading or g any of the works of Father Alexander, unain of excommunication ipfo facto. Which Dupin Bib. y discovers the rigid principles of that church, sublic fociety, however moderate the fentiof some of its private writers may appear. s certain, that from the time of Charlemagne, n the strength of his generosity to them, we he Popes talking in a louder and more maal strain than they had used before, not to ps only, but even to crowned heads. Hiwe have seen but little of their lordly lan-: They would hardly think of exercifing of it, on so poor an object as the Scottish As far back as Celestine's time, they t have heard, from the Roman troops that LETTER had been in Britain, some vague reports of a fierce, untrained people called Scots, and that there were believers among them. Their zeal no doubt might incline them to take an active part in spreading the faith further among such a people, even tho' they could expect no temporal emoluments from them. For at that early period our Church had, and could have, but few temporal emoha ments in her possession. . The mighty things whic? our historians, one after another, Boece, Buchz nan, Spotswood, &c. speak of the liberality of our Kings to the Church and churchmen, in affigur ing lands and heritages to them, in these ear I times, found indeed very well, but unfortunate! have not the smallest shadow of proof to suppo: them: And the pomp and luxury which fome < these writers inveigh so bitterly against, seem t have been altogether unknown in the days befor Palladius. Any notion we can form of these times by collecting and comparing what broken inform ation we have concerning them, feems to correl pond most of any thing we meet with, to the description of the primitive ages. Our anceston had in all probability been converted after the primitive manner, without formal missions, or fecular affistances. The coming of Palladius found them believers, which they could not have been without instruction from some quarter or other. But that instruction they might have had from the Britons in their neighbourhood, or even from a mong their Roman enemies, without either a Pop to rule them, or a Charlemagne to compel them One thing is deducible in reason, from a certaint of information, that as their conversion, from whatever time we date it, was coeval with the uni verial use of Bishops over all the Christian church refumable that they had Bishops too, which, LETTER: time of their appearance on the stage of hi-, they could as readily find, as they could yters or Monks. And the truth is, that as as we have any credible accounts about them; neet with an Episcopacy among them; a prie Episcopacy, not shining in state, or adornith titles, but a regular order of men to mathe affairs of religion, and provide the church necessary succession of clergy. These old Biwhether many or few at a time, seem to lived here and there, as was most conveniwith their clergy about them. For as yet we of no stately cathedrals, or sumptuous palaces he Bishops to reside in, or be confined to. The ons of later days are not the standard by which udge of these old times, either in church or The effentials of doctrine and government ht to be always the fame; but the externals appendages may and do vary: And perhaps way of living among the laity in Buchanan's : was as different from their forefathers way, hat of the Bishops in his day was from what been used in the primitive times. Yet the orand office was the same, and the Bishop, with ettled revenue either in land or money, had auch spiritual power inherent in the Episcopal racter, when regularly conveyed, as if he posad thousands or ten thousands a-year. The priive Bishops had the offerings of the faithful, the devotions, as they were then called, that the charitable donations of piously inclined ristians, at their disposal; which sufficiently anred all the temporal exigencies of the Church, lout of which every Bishop provided for the intenance of his Presbyters, whom he sent out,

LETTER as he saw expedient, to officiate in sacred things IX. thro' the different parts of his charge: For as ye there were no fixed presbyteral cures, or, as w now call them, Parishes with settled incumbent confined to them. All under the Bishop's inspec tion were his parish, and belonged to his church And the inferior clergy went out from him, an by his orders, to the various corners of his pa rish, to perform their ministrations, and returned Bed. lib. iif. again at his call. Thus Bede tells us, that Bisho cap. 26. Colman's clergy of Lindisfarne never went to the villages but to preach, baptize, visit the sick, and take care of the people's fouls; and that wheneve they came, the people affembled about them, to hear the word of life from them. And fuch, w may conclude, had been the practice of the Scot tish Church of Hy, whence Colman and his clerg came, and to whose rites we find them so scrupu lously adhering.

There was no appearance as yet among us of the many monastic orders, under various names, and of various colours, which were starting up in othe places, and in a subsequent period flocked over to our country in such numerous swarms. The ma nastery, as it is called, but more properly the Col lege of Hy-colmkill, as founded by Columba, wa of no order, and astricted to no rule that we know It was a fociety of clergy, ready at all time to answer any call or emergency, at the commani of the Abbot, under whose obedience the place was, or of a Bishop, when he came to visit it. The old Bishops, in other parts of the Christian Church had fuch monasteries, that is, societies of clergy about them, but widely different from the mona steries, or mixed conventions of clergy and laity which made fuch a figure and noise among th

Romanists in after-times. I know, many of our LETTER historians boast not a little of the simplicity, the poverty, and laboriousness of the old Scottish Monks before the coming of Palladius: And could they have assured me, from unquestionable vouchers, that there were such men at that period, I should, have given them credit for their character of them. But bare affertions are not a sufficient foundation for degrading comparisons, however just these comparisons might be, if there were ground for them. The idleness and uselessness of the Scottish Monks in the fifteenth and fixteenth centuries, is no proof that there were Monks in Scotland in the burth and fifth: And if it had not been to aim the weightier blow at the Monks and churchmen of his own time, we may suppose a man of Buchanan's stamp would not have so harmoniously chimed with the Popish Boece in a panegyric upon Monks at any time. I know too what a noise been made about our old Scottish Culdees, and how loftily they have been cried up by the Presbyterian party both at home and abroad, as the model of their constitution, and the laudable example which they copy after. But the accounts we have of them, from such remaining records a give any kind of intelligence concerning them, do not bring them within the period to which our inquiry has yet extended. For, during all the time of the separate establishment of the two kingdoms, there is not the least vestige to be met with m any old annals now extant, abstracting from the groundless flights of Boece, and partial invectives of Buchanan, of any order, rank, or character of clergy or teachers, among either the Picts or the Scots, different from the then practice of the universal church, which we are fure was, as far

LETTER back as Buchanan's Palladius, or even Boe Victor, perfectly and in the strictest sense of word, Episcopal. Nay, it appears farther, fi all that we know of these obscure ages, that Church in this country was much of the old mitive stamp in St Cyprian's time, governed: taught, as the African Church was, by her c Bishops and clergy, independent of the Church Rome, or of any other national church whatev yet willing to revere and hold communion v her, and with every other fifter-church, as far was confistent with that freedom and equa which belonged to every Bishop in the man: ment of affairs within his own jurisdiction, for which he was accountable to no ONE supe upon earth, but only for order's fake, and un Christ, to a lawful and regular Council of his ! thren Bishops of his own church and communi

> How long our Church continued in this p and primitive state, we shall soon discover in prosecution of our subject. Mean time, I am,

LETTER

LETT E R X.

Observations on the State of the Pictish Church and Nation-Its Union with the Scottish, under Kenneth Macalpine——Character of that Prince -His Removal of the Episcopal See from Abernetby to St Andrews ---- Account of the Culdees.

LTHOUGH we are now entering on a period of clearer intelligence than any we have hitherto met with, yet it is not in the very beginning of it, that we are to look for this agreeable change. The confused state in which we still and the civil constitution of our country, does not promise much order and regularity in the thurch concerns of it; and the incorporation of the two national Churches would take up time, • and be a work of fome difficulty, as well as the union of the two states. We are told indeed by our own writers, that the Church among the Ficts had been in a miserable state of servitude. So says Fordun; "Hitherto the Church (more " Pictorum) by the Pictish constitution, had been " fubject to flavery." And Buchanan to the same Scotichr. purpose observes, that " under the Picts the mi-Lib. iv. initers of the church had been little better than cap. 17-" flaves."

LETTER " flaves." Yea, an old chronicle, produced by Mr Innes, attributes the destruction of that people X.

lib. vi. in

to their oppressing the church. All which accu Buch, hith sations seem to be weakly founded; as none or them mention any particulars of that oppression Crit. Eff.y On the other hand we have feen some of the Pict. ish Kings as devout as their cotemporaries; a Naitan for instance, a Constantine, and a Hungus, building churches, and doing what they thought lay to their hands, to promote the interests of religion, and to support and encourage the ministers of it. Indeed there is an alleviation of this general charge offered, by supposing, that this might have been the case only under the two or three last of their Kings, from Hungus, to our Kenneth, who, in the eye of the Scottish writers, were all usurpers, and in that character would my no more regard to the liberties of the church than to the good of the people. But the real cause of this accusation, and, I might say, of all the contempt thrown upon the Pictish nation by late writers, feems to be this. The Scottish na tion had now got the prevalency, and would rea dily countenance every thing that might tend to lessen the glory of their former rivals the Picts-There had long been an emulation between the for martial prowefs, and we need not doubt be this spirit would diffuse itself even into the church concerns. The Picts had long stood or against the Scottish claim of succession. The fu claimant Alpin they had taken prisoner, and c off his head. His fon Kenneth had encounter numberless difficulties, and been obliged to ri many a bloody battle before he got his title esta lished, and the possession of the Pictish crown cured. This opposition, just or not, would nat fally irritate the victors, and no doubt occasion LETTER some cruelties to the persons of the Picts at that X. time, as well as the aspersions that were thrown out against their characters afterwards. They were certainly an ancient and a brave people, and from what sew monuments of them have been preserved, they appear, after their conversion, to have been as zealous and punctual in their religious observances as any of the neighbouring nations within the island.

Indeed I cannot help thinking that their fituation at the time of the Scottish claim, was truly pitiable, and that their standing out so long against that claim might in some measure be justified, if not according to the strict letter of right, yet by what appears to have been the practice of those The Scottish King Achaius had married Fergusia, fister to the Pictish King Hungus. her he had a fon Alpin, who on the death of Dorftologus and Eogan, the two fons of Hungus, without issue, laid claim to the Pictish crown in virtue of his mother's title. All our historians gree in this: Even Buchanan himself, no great friend to claims of this kind, acknowledges that Alpin fought the Pictish kingdom, as "fister's " fon to Hungus, and both by old law and right " of blood, the nearest heir." The old law which nuch hist. he refers to, he had found in Bede, who tells us reg. 67. that "when the Picts first came in among the "Scots, the Scots consented to furnish them with "wives upon this condition, that when the fuc-"cession came to be doubtful, they should chuse "their King rather out of the female line than "of the male;" which custom, Bede says, was Bed. Mb.i. observed among the Picts to his day. But that eap. 1. old law, if ever there was fuch an one, might U 2

LETTER have been forgotten in the course of so man hundred years, or might have been fet and when attended with any manifest inconvenience. The Picts faw the Scottish nation paying no re gard to immediate succession in their own king dom, but studying what they called the publi good on every vacancy of their throne. Thi very Alpin, who was claiming the Pictish king dom in right of his mother Fergusia, had no then fucceeded to his Father Achaius, and the Scottish monarch Dongallus, who was pushing Alpin's title by his mother, was possessing the inheritance which came to Alpin by his father. If Alpin was at that time a minor, and thereby in capable to govern the Scots, he would be equal ly incapable of governing the Picts. he was not a minor is certain: For between his father's death and his own, we are told then were only fourteen years, when his fon Kennett fucceeded, fo must have been born in his grand father's time. Confequently Alpin was then ca

> * A parallel instance seems to have occurred in the history o the Picts about 300 years before this. Their then King Loths had married Anna, fifter, and, at the time of her marriage, out heir to the British King Uther, by which marriage, and to draw Lothus into a league against the Saxons, it was stipulated, the the issue of Lothus by Anna should, failing lawful issue of Uther succeed to the British crown. Yet on Uther's death, the Bri tons set up his adulterous baltard Arthur, then only 18 years (age, in prejudice of Anna's son Modredus. And tho' Loth yielded to this breach of treaty in favour of Arthur, whon newed the former agreement about the succession, on the ever of his own dying without children, yet even in Arthur's lif time, and by his consent, the Britons set up a Constantine, heir of the crown, alledging the impropriety of their being g perned by a stranger, and that they had princes enough amo themselves to wield the British sceptre. So the children of An were set aside, and both Modred and Arthur sell in the contr

o have taken immediate possession of his fa- LETTER throne, without any necessity for the two ptions that were before him. What reason re, the Picts might argue, could the Scots claim the Pictish throne for their young when they were at the same time keepn out of their own? And had not they as title to fet up a Feredethus among themas the Scots had to fet up a Congallus nd then a Dongallus, in Alpin's room? furely most absurd in the Scots to claim ht of hereditary fuccession to their King's another kingdom, while they were for years excluding him from an equally fair en succession in their own. For the it is i on all hands, that Kenneth, in profecuthe war begun by his father Alpin, did at erly subdue the Picts with a great slaughd get possession of the Pictish kingdom by rce of his arms, yet it is equally certain e war was begun at first in pursuit of Alereditary right, and on no other account Fordun tells us, that even in the time avallus, who immediately fucceeded Alpin's Achaius, there arose a great question about the to the Piclish kingdom, which was faid ong to the Scots, and was univerfally talked h among the nobles and commonalty, but it at that time farther fought after. It was Scotichron. 's right therefore that began the quarrel, 1. iii. c. 64 in end, after nine or ten years struggle, l so fatal to the greatest part of the Pictish In which contention, tho' it may be ey brought that disaster on themselves by judged obstinacy, yet, all things considerley were not fo very blameable as has been

ed: Since they had the example of the

Scottifh

LETTER Scottish policy before their eyes, to warran their proceedings, and might plead the public good, as much as the Scottish estates did, for the privilege they often assumed, of appointing proper Kings to govern them, to the exclusion of the im mediate heir. It will not be an easy matter to reconcile this incongruity, to produce any folid, fa tisfying argument for the difference between Alpin's titles, and his fon Kenneth's as derived from him, to the two crowns of the Picts and Scots. or to shew why hereditary right should be pled for the one, and the other made to stand on the favour of the people. Our historians may amuse us with old laws, and original compacts, and rhe torical flourishes "de jure regni apud Scotos:" And from fuch plaufible inventions they may infer a diversity of constitution in the two states, which is all indeed that can be faid on the fubiect, and is only faid but not proved, as there are no documents extant to evince fuch a diverfity, in these antient times, between two such neighbouring nations. However, the historical accounts of this affair, if they are to be credited, may ferve to confirm an observation which the annals of the old Grecian and Roman republica hold out to us, and of the truth of which even modern times afford not a few demonstrations. that these very nations or states which are most tenacious of their own liberties, under the popular pretence of claiming what they call the common and natural rights of mankind, feldom stick at any method, when in their power, of invad ing the liberties of others, and endeavouring to bring their weaker neighbours under that flaver which they themselves profess to abhor.

With this observation, I now take leave of th Picts.

Picts, and go on in the profecution of my de-LETTER fign, from this important era of the union of the two crowns, whether by fuccession or conquest, in the person of Kenneth Macalpin, who was the first monarch of that part of Britain now called Scotland. Our historians all agree in giving him a great character not only for bravery and resobution, of which his at last subduing the outstanding part of the Pictish nation was a visible monument, but likewise for every virtuous quality. that becomes a wife and good King. Both Fordun and Boece mention a number of excellent Scotichron. laws made by him, for the regulation of his new Liv. cap. 8. kingdom, which Fordun fays were called the Boeth. Macalpine laws, among which are to be found some statutes concerning ecclesiastical matters, which were no doubt made in a public meeting or affembly, with the concurrence of the Bishops; fince it was the universal discipline of the church in those times, that no ecclesiastical laws could be enacted without episcopal authority and content. In these assemblies the secular and ecclesiallical states used to sit promiseuously- This was the practice of Charlemagne and his next succesfor in France and Germany. And from the correspondence between these countries and ours, we may be allowed to infer, that Kenneth would readily adopt a plan formed by fuch a prudent prince, and tending, in all appearance, to heal the intestine discords, and promote the general good of his now extended kingdom.

His first public transaction in church matters, that we are certain of, after his settlement on the Riclish throne; was removing the episcopal see from Abernethy in Strathern to the church of St. Reul or Kilremont, which he ordained to be

LETTER ever after called St. Andrews. Both these place had belonged to the Picts. Abernethy had been one of their royal cities, and the residence of their chief Bishop: But it would seem Kennet had taken difgust at the place, because the Pict when they flew his father, had exposed his hea as a public spectacle in the most conspicuous par Kilremont, formerly Mucross, on the East ern coast of Fife, had been traditionaly famou for the landing of the Monk Regulus or Reu with the relics of St. Andrew out of Greece So from regard to this tradition which was pro bably current in Kenneth's time, or to perpetuat the veneration which his predecessor and gran uncle Hungus had expressed for the Apostle, th episcopal dignity was now transferred to thi place, which has retained that lustre thro' a long fuccession of Bishops, whose names are on record from the date of this removal down to the en of the last century. And here it may not b improper to observe that, in the affair of this translation, none of our historians take the less notice of the Pope's having any concern, or (the King's thinking his confent necessary; the at that time, in other parts of the christian churc fuch a business would not have been transacte without the Pope's having a hand in it. Th erecting or changing episcopal sees was a pr vious jewel in the papal mitre, and the historic of these ages are full of the interference and o ders of the Popes on these occasions. But it seen they as yet had little knowledge of what was d ing in our Northern parts; and when we fu them afterwards beginning to take concern as interpose their authority in our church affair we are not told that they found any fault wi removal of the episcopal see to St. Andrews, LETTER out their concurrence: Which shews, that in matters a national church may make use of wn inherent powers, and study what is most le to her present convenience, without the ledge or confent of any other church, even e church of Rome herself. This was the tive form of church-government, however incroached upon by Romish pride, or fetby worldly policy in after-times: And when incroachments, from whatever quarter, are d to immoderate lengths, and begin to be ther destructive of the church's well-being effential interests, every national church, as t of the one catholic, may resume her origirivileges, and mould her outward constituas to her spiritual governors shall appear expedient. On this footing was the fee of ndrews at this time erected, and the Bishops at fee were henceforward called the princi-3ishops of the Scots, and were looked up to respect and deference by all the clergy of Scottish church.

will be proper now, according to what I prol in the close of my former letter, to take notice of a particular class of clergy in our try, who about this time began, and long nued to make a figure, under the peculiar mination of Culdees; and whose character, Escribed by our later historians, has been imed by some writers, foreign as well as doc, into a vindication of that plan of churchrnment which rejects Bishops, and admits no tes of superiority in the church. Boece says, Hist. 1. vi. e first preachers of the gospel here being holy id devout men, were called Culdees, quafi Coli-

LETTER " dei, or cultores Dei, Worshippers of God." A p. 138. Introdu & ch. 16.

Buchanan in one place adopts this interpretation tho' before he feems to derive the word from Buch. Hist. cells where they lived in a state of recluse solitu Lib. vi in This is Archbishop Spottswood's opinion, wh lib.iv. r.35 is in some measure adopted by the Bishop of Hist. b. 1. Afaph. But the most probable of all feems Hill Ace. be what Mr. Goodall offers, that the name appe to be of Scotch original, compounded of Ke a fervant, and Dhe God, as in all the papers which mention them, they are called 'I lener, not Culdei, according to Boece's fanci etymology. These Culdees are described as peculiar order of men, who had peculiar tenets their own, and performed their ministerial fur tions with great strictness and attention, exac on the model of the modern parity: And t description of their character has been mu laid hold of, and infifted on by certain write with great keenness. But when we ask for t proofs on which it is founded, we find none, I must rest satisfied with honest Boece's single : thority. Yet he is by far too late a voucher: a fact of fo high antiquity, and of fuch forced i portance. It is furprizing that Bede, who wro eight hundred years before Boece, found no C dees among the Scots in his day: Nor Adams nus, in his life of Columba, the great founder what was then called the monastic institution our country. The filence of two fo early w ers, who had fuch opportunities to know, a whose business led them to take notice of su peculiarities among the clergy whom they' we describing, gives some ground to suspect the what Boece and his followers fay of them, is lit better than vague declamation. The earliest at of the Culdees that we can depend upon, LETTER rom the chartulary of St. Andrews, where meet with a deed of Brude fon of Dergard. last King of the Picts, giving the island of hlevin to Almighty God and to St. Servaand "Keledeis Deo servientibus et servitus," to the Keledees ferving and to ferve , in that island. This would be thought fuition by those of our days, who boast so much nitating these antient Culdees: But they, it s, had no fuch fcruples. Accordingly the lees of Lochlevin are often mentioned with es of distinction, on public occasions, and doubt were active in spreading their order, may be called fo, thro' other parts of the try. Thus we find Keledees, not Culdees, rechin, Dunkeld, Muthil, Abernethy, &c. and Abbots and Friars witnessing the deeds of ops, and getting churches and tythes from with the "cure of fouls"; which furely d not have happened, if the Culdees had held article in doctrine, government, or worship, 18t from what was then professed in the nad church. Nay the Culdees themselves never ed to wear the episcopal mitre, when it was larly offered to them. Thus Gregory Bishop Junkeld, Andrew Bishop of Caithness, and others, were chosen from among the Cul-: Nor did these Culdee Bishops refuse the pary defignations, as appears from the folng; "I Gregory, by the authority of God id of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, and the holy Apostle Andrew, Bishop of Duneld." It is true the superiors of the Culdee vents had frequent disputes with their respec-Bishops about lands and tythes, and such se-X 2

LETTER cular matters: And if their contending thus wi Bishops be the part of their character that ple es most now-a-days, it should be remembered what method they took to have the contention decided, which was always by application to tl Pope, as at that time the grand umpire in all fue contendible cases. Would Calvin, with his Cr dees at Geneva, or John Knox, with his follow ers in Scotland, have made fuch an application, fubmitted to the Pope's decision? Why the should they pretend to imitate the Culdee clerg or talk fo highly of the good old Scottish Culdee as if that title had been peculiar to Scotland? W are told by Archbishop Usher, that the Kelede

Wher de Prim. a, 637.

of Armagh in Ireland were anciently the Dean ar Chapter of that church, but were forced to gi way to Monks of a later institution, the' the were still suffered to remain in lower stations, ar continued in that church, and in the church Cluanynish, until the Archbishop's remembranc

Ħff, Acc. P. 144.

The Bishop of St. Asaph produces Giraldus Car brensis, who lived about the year 1200, mention ing the Colidei (which is the first time, the Bisho fays, this latinized title is to be met with) in the little island of Bardsey in North Wales, and i another island in Tipperary in Ireland, who de voutly served in a Chapel there. And a later write Mr Tanner, informs us, that there were Culder at St. Peter's in York. So it appears, that other churches had Culdees as well as ours. Yea. fuc as the old pure Scottish Culdees are described have been, were the inferior Clergy in all the primitive church. For as foon as we have a certain information about them, we find them communion with, and even subject to ecclesias cal superiors, as indeed their first certain appear was in the days of confest superiority in the LETTER! 1; fo that, whatever other peculiarities have been about them, there is nothing ir history to countenance the use that has dern times been made of them in favour of velling scheme. Had that learned French enot in the last century, Mr. David Blondel, is well acquainted with the history of our es, as our own critics have been, he would confidently have adduced them to his purof maintaining ordination by Presbyters: it is not much to the honour of our own rymen, who might have known better, to much stress on the mistakes of a foreigner. however judicious in many respects, could e fufficiently versed in every thing relative r nation. For after all that has been faid. n be faid about the Culdees, as a particular or order of clergy among the Scots, there have been nothing peculiar about them but name, a name derived from some of the diathen spoken in Britain, and according to Goodal's interpretation, (which the addiclause in King Brude's gift, "Deo servitibus, servants of God," seems to corroboappropriated to the clergy in general, withmy respect had to superiority or equality g them. Even Boece himself, the great of this Culdee fabric, gives some ground his notion in the place before quoted, where ys, "These Culdees chose by common vote nong themselves, a Chief Priest who had wer in things belonging to God, and who r many years after was called Bishop of the cots." This is his account of the matter, h, if there be any truth in it, plainly shews LETTER that the Culdees had a Chief-priest or Bisho! mong them. But indeed there is no great cr where due to it: And yet the certainty of the cle being called Culdees, as foon as there were cle among the Scots, needs not be doubted, might have gone by this name among their co trymen, even in Adamnanus' and Bede's tir tho' these writers had not thought fit to tra form it into the Latin idiom: And both Ada nanus' Columba, and Bede's Aidan, might ha been called Keledee in the Gaelic language Hy, as properly as Servus or Vir Dei, (servi or man of God) in the Latin. There is nothi in the word Keledee, under any derivation, to h der its belonging to, or being descriptive of any c rical rank or order in, the church; nothing b what may be as applicable to a Bishop, as to a Pr byter or Monk. And under this designation of I ledees, peculiar not to the people but to the b guage, the Scottish clergy might have continued be distinguished at home, and to enjoy the old p mitive privilege of chusing their Bishops from mong themselves, till in process of time, alor with other deviations, the nomination of Bishe began to come from other quarters, and fwan of favourite monks (as we shall see in cour poured in from abroad upon them. On this gr dual change of discipline, we may suppose the Scottish clergy would for some time retain the old Scottish name of Keledee, and be distinguit ed by that name, as much from contempt as 1 fpect, in the latinized writings of subsequent time And this may help to account for the many a hot disputes between the few who still adher to the old way under the old name, and the cl gy who were brought in upon them either by:

il or papal power. In these disputes the Cul-LETTER ses feldom prevailed; and by degrees were deived of most of their possessions, or incorporatlinto fome of the new orders. The last of them to kept their ground, as they feem to have en the oldest of the denomination, were the Cules of Lochlevin. This body of them had for a ig time been, what modern times would call, e chapter of St. Andrew's, and had enjoyed privilege of electing the Bishop, till King Da-Haffigned it to the Prior and Canons Regular St. Augustin, whom his brother Alexander d brought in and fettled at St. Andrew's. is change occasioned frequent debates and apals to Rome, in which the Culdees generally d the worst: Till in the year 1298, Mr. Lamrton Chancellor of Glasgow, being by the Prior d Canons of St. Andrew's chosen Bishop on Edeath of Bishop Fraser, the then superior of the dees of Lochlevin, William Cuming (whom th Archbishop Usher and the Bishop of St. aph, from some vitiated record, call Aulmin) posed the election, and revived his claim bethe Pope: But after strenuous debates on th fides, the matter was finally decided in faur of the Prior, with this additional honour, that all time coming, the Prior of St. Andrew's mid have precedence of all the Abbots and iors in Scotland, and the now neglected Culwere for ever excluded from their former ghts: Which, fays Archbishop Spotswood, turniso much to their difgrace, that their name and nder was by little and little quite extinguished; ad from this time we hear no more of them.

From the little I have faid about them, you my plainly fee, there is nothing in their history

LETTER of any great importance, or that can finity info III. any material peculiarity: And their same is a more than a description, in the old language of the country, of the ministers of religion in gene ral, without regard to distinction or character of any fort. I am, bc.

LETTER XL

Two Objections to Diocesan Episcopacy enswered— State of the Scottish Church, from the Time of Kenneth Macalpine to the Death of Gregory the Great.

AVING, in the preceding Letter, discussed the argument drawn from the history of the Scottish Culdecs, in favour of ecclesiastical parity, I am now to take notice of two more objections, raised from the history of these old times, to combat the ecclesiastical settlements of after-ages. It has been said, that in these early days, there was but one Bishop in Scotland, who after Kenneth Macalpin's time, had his residence at St. Andrews, having been removed thither from Abernethy, which had been, in like manner, the residence of the one Bishop among the Picts. And for this we are referred to the authority of Fordun, whe says that "Garnard King of the Picts built the LETTER sllegiate Church of Abernethy, and that in at church there were three elections made, hen as yet there was but one Bishop in the Scotichr. ngdom." From this it is inferred, that what w called Diocesan Episcopacy under a multiof Bishops, was not the old constitution of church, but a late innovation, brought in by revailing superstition of after-times. t easy to see the force or design of this obserin, tho' it were true. One great complaint of opposers of Episcopacy has been, that Bishopare for the most part too large, and beyond one man's ability to take a proper overfight of But certainly the most extensive Diocese ever was in Scotland, was not equal to the le kingdom in the number of christians, even enneth Macalpin's time, and for many years re him. So that the inconvenience complainof lies on the fide of the present supposition, not on any fublequent division, which tended er to remove the alledged grievance. But the h is, there is no ground for the supposition th Fordun has occasioned: For, the we were ive him credit for what he fays of the one op among the Picts in Garnard's time, and three elections after, yet it should be rememd, that he makes this Garnard the immediate effor of Brude, fon of Meilochon, who was verted and baptized by Columba; fo that one sop might for some years have been sufficient this new church among the northern Picts, till the faith should spread more diffusively ing them. But from all that Fordun or any owing writer fays, it does not follow that this s the case at Kenneth's accession, which was more

NI. time: Only that for some reason or other, which our historians have not come to the certain knowledge of, he thought sit to deprive Abernethy of the honour of a resident Bishop, and invest Kilremont with it.

That the Bishop of St. Andrews was not the only Bishop in Scotland, before that division of the kingdom into Dioceses, which all our historians agree in, we have, if not undoubted proofs, such strong prefumptions at least, as would be sustained in other cases. In the time of Kenneth III. little more than a hundred years after the present era, we are told, even by Buchanan, that he applied to the Bishops and Monks for their service and adviceupon a certain ferious occasion. Both Boece and Spotwood give us the names of several of these Bishops, particularly of a Moveanus, who was the King's Confessor. And about the same time, we read in the English annals, of a Scottish Bishop, Beornet mus, affifting at an English Synod at Calne in Wiltshire: None of whom, neither Moveanus nor Beornelmus, are to be found in any of the feven Catalogues which Bishop Keith has given us of the Bishops of St. Andrews, so have belonged to some other place, and from the accounts of them, feem to have been men of character and repute. there is so little foundation for this conceit, and fo little to be made of it, tho' it were better founded, that I should not have so much as mentioned it, if it had not been to let nothing, however trivial, pass unobserved, which the adversaries of Scottish Episcopacy can possibly allege against it.

But there is another objection to Diocesan Episcopacy, of a quite different complexion, draws from the history of these times, and held forth but differen different writers for different purposes. These LETTER objectors allow that there were more Bishops in the country than either at Abernethy or St. Andrews, but infift that they were confined to no district, but performed their Episcopal functions at large, or wherever they happened to reside or travel. This had been faid by Boece, with a compliment to the veneration which the fanctity of their conversation procured them. After him Buchanan Buch. hist. makes the fame observation, that "the old lib. vi. in bishops of the Scots, being chosen out of the reg. 69. "monasteries, while as yet there was no conten-"tion amongst them for honours and places, but " only for piety and learning, did, without envy " or emulation, perform their office every where " as they found occasion, there being then no divi-" fion of provinces, and the ecclefiastical function " not a business of worldly gain." This is indeed a pecious and much magnified description of the mient constitution of our church. But if it be thought to militate against Diocesan Episcopacy, does it not equally overthrow Parochial Presbytery? Or were the Presbyters fixed to particular parishes, and the Bishops the only itinerants, who had no peculiar charge allotted to them? One thing is ertain, that in the primitive church, before Confantine's time, there were separate districts assigned to the several Bishops, who, besides their gemeral concern in the whole flock of Christ, were particularly connected with, and under certain regulations restricted, as it were, to these districts. Now by whom could fuch affignments be made? Notby the fecular powers: For they were, for three hundred years, against the church in general, so would have no hand in any of her particular conterms. It could be done only by the church herY 2 felf, XI.

≈.

LETTER self, by the joint concurrence of her Bishops of Governors, as they found it convenient and pract ticable, the for the most part as near to the provincial divisions of the state, as the situation c And when the stat church affairs would admit. came into the church by the Emperors becoming Christians, the old appointments made by the church were in most instances homologated by the state, tho' in some few cases, and for the honou of some favourite cities, alterations were some times proposed by the Emperors, and agreed to b the Bishops. Might not something like this have been the original model of our church, botl among the Picts and Scots? And when our histori ans fay that a King Garnard fixed an Episcopa See at Abernethy, or a Kenneth one at St. An drews, may not the meaning be, that these wer the only restrictions which these Kings interfere in, the one, we may suppose, out of favour to hi royal feat, and the other out of veneration to th memory of the apostle St. Andrew? And that th rest of the country was left by them to be so order ed and divided, for receiving the benefit of religi ous offices, as the other Bishops and Clergy shoul judge most expedient? In which case, the mo natural conclusion is, that they would adopt whe they could not but know was the form of the tholic church at all times and in all nations. For that a promiseyous ministry in holy things, suc as our historical relations in the common accept tion feem to infinuate, could be for any space time adhered to over a whole national church, not at all supposable, as history affords no instance and reason disproves the possibility of it. confusion of attendance, such an uncertainty supply, in a word, such universal disorder and

rity would be the consequence, as would be LETTER act opposition to the apostolic canon, "Let things be done decently, and according to ler." And even in Buchanan's narration, i is on enlargement upon Boece, and the d-work of all the modern notions upon this t, there may be found what is sufficient to er the inconsistency of his story, with the He fays, the interpretation put upon it. ishops of the Scots, who thus travelled and n out of monasteries. Now these monasteries be no other than focieties of Clergy or chmen, and the Monks, so much spoken of se days, were men who had dedicated themto, and were preparing for the service of the :h. Out of these societies, Buchanan says, lishops were chosen. Be it so: I would ask, chose them? It will be answered, the other is or members of the monasteries. purpose, or for whose benefit were they n, whoever shall be said to be the electors? is the main question, and ought to be attend-In the common acceptation of election of ps or Ministers, which is such a darling prie with some people, as if the whole of religion wrapped up in it, it can only hold, and inis only claimed, when there is a vacancy in particular place, upon the death or removal e Bishop or Minister who had been particularmnected with that place before. But on our nt hypothesis there can be no such vacancy, ere is supposed no such particular connection; ere can be no necessity, nor indeed room, for new election, till all the Bishops of the king-. should be dead at one time. Besides, when Bu

LETTER Buchanan speaks of monasteries in the plural nu XI. ber, is it to be understood that, when there v need to chuse a Bishop, he was to be chosen or of all the monasteries, or only out of one of the at one time, and out of another at another tin according to the various exigencies that requir or directed the choice? This last, I presume, w be allowed to be his meaning: And if so, it w follow, that the nearest monastry would be appli to for a Bishop, when there was occasion for or and the people in that neighbourhood would to upon themselves as more immediately under su a Bishop's inspection, or, as we say now-a-day properly belonging to his charge. The mon teries were certainly fixed to some one particul fpot of ground, and the monks or clergy w studied in them, being, as we may suppose, f the most part natives of the respective neighbor hoods, would originally have, or in time contraan acquaintance with the christian people row This would form a connexion t about them. tween them and the people, and would lead to a plications from the latter, and a readiness in t former with respect to the exercise of ecclesiastic administrations. Whether such a connexion cov be called strictly Diocesan, is not material to i quire. It feems to be the most natural form the can be supposed, and most analogous to what are fure was the constitution of the church in ! Cyprian's days, when the then prevailing Ep copacy is on all hands acknowledged to have be truly and properly Diocesan. Yea, there is other way of understanding the concurrent, t imperfect accounts, which our histories give us the Episcopal management in those days. Box indeed fays, that the kingdom was not as yet vided into Dioceses: And Buchanan tells us, that LETTER the countries were not as yet marked out, " nullis "adhuc regionibus definitis." But this might be faid with reference to their own times, and to fuch standing and determined distributions as had been afterwards made, either by regal or papal authority. For in old times the country was not nicely divided into provinces or shires, as it is now, under the particular jurisdiction of subordinate judges or magistrates; but the King sent out his justiciars to the various parts of the kingdom, at his pleasure, or as he saw necessary. And yet we are not to think, that these justiciars had promiscuous powers to interfere as they pleased in one another's regulations, which, instead of answering the good end proposed, would have caused a frange jumble of anarchy and confusion; but we must believe them to have been restricted to certain limits, and their jurisdiction to have been particularly applied to these restrictions. Why may we not suppose that the Church-government would, as nearly as possible, follow the same orderly and beneficial plan, and that the Bishops would be appointed to their feveral ministrations in such a way as not to entangle, or interfere with one another, in the effential and indispensible parts of their sacred function?

VId

Indeed, upon a close examination of all this account of Buchanan's, which came from his pen, so doubt, with a particular design, we shall find nothing in it peculiar to our nation, or which the espousers of ecclesiastical parity can fairly lay hold of, to patronize their departure from the original institution. Where Buchanan says, that in those days the sacred function was not "quæstuaria," a business of worldly gain, he says what is very right.

r XI. days. But it does not follow that the Bishops then had no means to live by, nor subsistence to depend upon. He himself tells us, that "Hungus "King of the Picts gave the tenth of all his royal Buch. hist. "domains to St. Andrew," which, in the laying guage of those days, if true, (and we have Buchanan's word for it) was a donation, and a liberal one too, to the church. And an old writer, hundred and twenty years after Bede, so is comporary with this King Kenneth, speaks of a village called Wedale, in the Lothians, not far from the monastery of Melross, which village, he says, was supposed to the Bishop of St. Andrews, "nunc juris

Nennius, who lived in the ninth century, a

" Episcopi S. Andreæ." By donations of this kind, the clergy, it seems, were sufficiently supported; and it is not unlikely that even then, amidst all the simplicity and disinterestedness, which Buchanan and his party fo much extol, there might be fometimes a few worldly-minded spirits who would follow Christ for the loaves, and, in a carnal fense, wish to make gain of godliness. I have faid this much by way of reasoning, upon the part of our church history now before me, both to do justice, as I thought, to the historical accounts of our church settlement in those days, and because we have lived to see the common acceptation of these accounts made use of to justify a particular scheme of Episcopacy, which I shall take a view of, when I come nearer to our own times.

The erection of the See of St. Andrews is the principal thing, in ecclefiastical management, the we find recorded of this brave and successful Kin Kenneth Macalpine, and from this time downward

e the succession of its Bishops preserved. LETTER there is some difference in the order and of the most ancient of them, which, conthe darkness of those times, and some rcumstantial difficulties, is not much to be The continuator of Fordun's hifces Fothad at the head of them, where he The first, as I find, was Fothad, who was scottehren. lled by K. Indulphus, and of whom I find 1. vi. c. 24. verses, written on the margin of a filver of the gospels in St. Andrews, anc Evangelij thecam construxit avitus thad, qui primus Scotis episcopus est." refe two lines, fuch as they are, have been d of to disprove the antiquity of Episco-Scotland. And a late writer against it, nes Dalrymple, has, on the authority of isserted that " the Scots had no Bishops Coll. Hills ig them till the reign of Indulphus, a p. 126. lred years after Kenneth Macalpin, because ad, who lived under Indulphus, is, in this iption, expressly called the first Bishop." it has been again and again answered, as case of Palladius, that the designation of Bishop," is to be understood of the primate cipal Bishop, that is, the Bishop of the principal See; especially as, in the present ie same writer produces a copy of this inn, taken out of the "Excerpts of the rer of St Andrews," and prior to Fordun's ator, which has "fummus," chief, instead imus," first Bishop *, the catalogue of these Bishops, according to Fordun's or, we meet with a second Fothad, whom Boece and a mention as mediating a peace between the two com-

Archbishop Spotswood in his list of the Bishops LETTER of St. Andrews, on the authority of Boece, mentions an Adrian as the first of them, who was killed by the Danes in the Isle of May, along with Stolbrandus another Bishop, and a number of inferior clergy. This irruption of the Danes was likewise fatal to the King, Constantine the fon of Kenneth, who was taken prisoner in battle by them, and murdered in a cave. Under this King, and probably in Adrian's time, there was held a convention at Scoon, where, according to Boece and Spotfwood, it was among other things enacted, "That the clergy should reside upon " their charges, and have no meddling in fecular " business: That they should instruct the people ". diligently, and give good example in their con-" versation: That they should not keep hawks, "hounds, or horses of pleasure: That they should " not carry weapons, nor be pleaders of civil " causes, but should live contentedly on their " own provisions: And if they were found to "transgress in any of these points, for the first " fault they were to be fined, and for the second ". deprived of their office and living." Buchanan takes care to represent all this in a much stronger light: For he fays " that the King by the feverity of his laws brought back to their old, frugal " way of living the Sacerdotal order, who lay-" ing aside the preaching of the gospel, were de-" bauched with luxury, and had given thempetitors for the crown, Grimus and Malcolm, near forty years after the Fothad who was expelled by Indulfus, and lived only eight years after his expulsion. Now as the inscription does not specify the time when it was made, it might have been after Fothad the second's time, in which case the title of first in it might belong not to the Bishop, but to the Man, and might signify nothing more but that Fothad the First gave that silver case.

selves entirely up to hunting, hawking, and all LETTER the pastimes of the court." This is furely ring a great deal more to the prejudice of the rgy, than his voucher Boece had put in his uth. For the laws at this time enacted do not essarily suppose the clergy actually fallen into h excesses, as Buchanan confidently enough af-15, but might only be designed by way of cau-, to prevent their falling into them, by copythe example of the clergy in Germany and nce, whose late acquisition of lands and hoirs, conferred on them by Charlemagne and fon Louis, had led them into fuch degrees of ravagance and riot as required to be curbed imperial prohibitions: And lest the infection uld spread by the intercourse then begun been the French and Scots, it was both prudent pious in our King, with advice of his council, these regulations to put the clergy on their rd, and point out their duty and danger to For that they were in fact fo corrupted Buchanan describes them, is not very likely n from his own account of them, a little be-At Kenneth's accession he speaks of them "holy men, without avarice or pomp:" And ing Kenneth's reign, whom he admires for justice and wisdom of his government, it is probable that they would either have inclinor been allowed to depart fo far from their ner regularity of life and conversation. vention is faid to have been held within fix or in years at most after Kenneth's death, which, : should think, was too short a time to proce fuch a flagrant alteration of manners in any iety of men whatever. It is true, both Boece d Buchanan have thought proper to represent \mathbf{Z}_{2}

XI. Donald, the brother and successor of Kenneth, a a cowardly, vicious, and corrupt Prince, and even Archbishop Spotswood, from their testimony, attributes all these fancied disorders to the degeneracy and dissoluteness of his five years reign.—

Scotichron. But Fordun on the contrary says, he was a brave foldier, a warlike and victorious King, and that after a happy reign he died a natural death at Scoon, (or, as an old chronicle produced by Mr.

P..783. Innes has it, in his own palace of Bellochor) and was as much lamented at his death as his brother the great Kenneth had been. If all this be true of Donald Macalpin's character, and it is fully as credible as the opposite account, it confirms what I have said about the intention of King Constantine's laws, and in vindication of the Scottish clergy of his day, from that heavy charge which Buchanan, with so slight a soundation from Boece, has brought against them.

But in whatever light we view this matter, we cannot but admit the justness of Archbishop Spotswood's observation, that "at that time it was held "no diminution of the ecclesiastical authority for Princes to give laws to the clergy, and to puse nish them if they were found guilty of any of fence or crime." The doctrine of exempting the persons of church-men from the cognizance of the civil powers, had not as yet reached these Northern parts, and the church, which has since claimed that unscriptural privilege, was not then altogether in a capacity to enforce it. In such things indeed as properly belong to, and are radi-LETTER ally inherent in the church, such as continuing he apostolic succession, and administering the oriinal institutions of the gospel, she is absolutely inependent of any earthly power whatever: As a parate fociety in herself, under her only head nd governor in heaven, to whom alone she is countable for the exercise of the spiritual powers with which he has entrusted her. But in maten of civil life and conversation, as members of be state, and making a part of the respective ommunity to which they belong, the facred haracter of the clergy is so far from protecting ny scandalous infringement of these laws of chritian morality which it binds and authorizes them o inculcate, that as it aggravates the guilt, fo it bould rather increase than diminish, much less toally prevent, the legal punishment due to such inringement from those to whom the power of such unishment is by divine authority committed.

^{*} The same Chronicle adds, what none of our historians have taken notice of, that "in his time the laws and royal statutes of his great-grand-stater Edalbus" (the historians call him Elsnus, i. e. in the Gaelic language Ed the White) "were renewed by the Goedeli, i. e. the Scots with him at Forteviot."

After the lamentable death of this good King constantine, and the short reign of his brother thus, Gregory the Great as he is called, mountd the throne, a Prince much extolled by all our viters, as one of the bravest and best Kings that And indeed if these churchver the nation had. men, who cannot endure the least degree of subsction to the fecular powers, shall be offended with the seeming encroachment of King Constanine's laws upon their high claim of total indepenlence, they will be pleafed with Gregory's kindvels in "fecuring their immunities, exempting " them from paying tribute, keeping watch, or " going to warfare, and committing the judg-" ment of matrimonial causes, testaments, and of " all things depending on simple promise to their " de-

LETTER " decision, with power to make canons and co " stitutions for exercise of discipline upon su " offenders as came under their cognizance." This is Archbishop Spotswood's account, bor. rowed from Boece, of the privileges granted by Gregory to the church. Buchanan speaks of them in more general terms, tho' at the same time more in conformity to what is faid of him, in an excerpt from the register of St Andrews produced Cribe Essay by Mr. Innes; Gregory, he says, provided for the

p. 802.

" immunities of the ministers of the church, who " under the Picts, had been little better than " flaves, partly by reviving old laws, partly by " making new ones." But even Buchanan joins with the rest in his praises, and tells us "that

" for his valour, justice and temperance, he de-" fervedly obtained the title of the Great among

" posterity."

Yet, whatever title he had to these commendations, his right to the crown of the united kingdoms is not fo very clear and indifputable. I do not mean to contend his possession of the Scottish crown, because we are told that it could be disposed of by the estates of the realm to apy person whom they should judge most worthy, provided he was of the Fergusian line, of which Gregory indeed was. But did fuch disposal entitle him to the Pictish crown also, which came in to the eldest branch of the Fergusian line by heritage, and to which Prince Alpin, the reprefentative of that branch, succeeded as nearest heir by right of blood? With this blood Gregory had no connection: His father Dongallus had indeed been King of the Scots, before Alpin, but he had no relation to, nor concern with the Pictish throne, being only a very distant relation to King Achai who married the Pictish heiress. This succession LETTER he himself acknowledged, was personal right and property to Alpin and his posterity. What right therefore had his fon to deprive a descendant of Alpin's of this property? Yet this the Great Gregory did: He usurped the Pictish crown, from Alpin's grandson Ethus, and was the cause of his death. For the Boece and Buchanan both fay that Ethus, for his mal-administration, was degraded by his nobles, and died in prison, yet our other two historians Fordun and John Major, as Scotichron: well as the excerpt quoted before, all agree that Hift. lib.iii. he was killed in battle by Gregory, (the excerpt cap. 2. calls him Girg Macdongall) who was disputing Crit. Essay. the crown with him. Whether Ethus had usurped the right of his elder brother's fon, or, as was then the practice, acted only as factor or regent for that fon, till he was fit to reign in his own person, says nothing at all for Gregory: It was injustice in him to defraud the posterity of the great Kenneth of their maternal inheritance, which neither himself nor his ancestors had any claim to; and even upon the pretended principles of the Scottish government, to wrest the management of it out of the hands of the nearest heirs, when they were of age capable to manage it themselves. Upon the whole then, the Justest character that can be given of him, may be faid to be what Buchanan gives of Macbeth for the first ten years of his government, that if he had not used violence in attaining the throne, he might have been reckoned equal "to the best of the former Kings."

But besides all his other princely virtues, this Gregory is commended likewise for his chastity, and Boece more than once applauds him for having

#B4 ECCLESIASTICAL HISTOR'

LETTER ing lived all his days not only a batchele even "veneris expers," without any coi with women. Yet, in a description of th of the Empire, published in the year 166 Louis du May, who feems to have be acquainted with the genealogy of all the ous families in it; we are told of a Louis. of Freiberg and Furstemberg, who made : in the court of the Emperor Henry the that "he was ion to Frederic and Agnes "ter to Gregory, firnamed the Great, ! "Scotland, and of him are the present he "Furstemberg descended." But this is only mistake of the kind which our histo their complimenting strain have fallen into even this, may ferve to shew how little depend on the characters which are hande to us, of many of our Scottish Princes.

I am, 8

* The late Bishop Keith has discovered a similar nother character of another of our Kings, Malcolm IV. who of his supposed continency is commonly called "the and yet in a charter of donation by this Malcolm, of the of Innerlethan to the Monks of Kelso, there is this no clause, assigning the reason of the gift, because, he saw corpse of my son was laid here the first night after hi

LETTER; XII.

LETTER XII.

Rights of the Scottish Churches consirmed in an Assembly at Scoon—Bishop Fothad expelled from St Andrews by Indulphus—Kellach, Bishop of that See, goes to Rome for the Consirmation of his Title to it—Remarks on the Tyranny of the Romish Church, in imposing such Journeys.

N the death of Gregory, Donald the fon of A. D. 893. Constantine, and grandson of Kenneth, as-cended the throne, being recommended by Gregory to the Nobles, fays Buchanan in conformity to his principles, but more probably on account of his being the lineal heir, and of a proper age to take the reins of government into his hands. He reigned only eleven years, and was fucceeded by his cousin Constantine the son of Ethus: In whose time, we read, in the chronicle I quoted before, of a council or affembly holden at Scoon Crit. Estay; in the year 906, in which the King Constantine p. 588. and Kellach the Bishop, with the Scots, "folemn-" ly vowed to observe the laws and discipline of " faith, and the rights of the churches and of " the gospel, on a little hill near the royal city of Scoon, called from hence, Collis Credulitatis,

LETTER " the Hill of Faith." Mr. Innes supposes it have been called Knoc-creidimh in the then vi gar language, and takes it to have been the far place so famous afterwards by the name of t Mute-hill of Scoon. None of our historians me tion this council: Only a catalogue of the Bishc of St. Andrews, given by Mr Ruddiman, fays general, that Bishop Kellach held a province council under King Constantine III. in the ye 906. And even from the short account given it, we learn that the Scottish churches were the fupposed to have rights, and that the King ar nobility thought themselves bound to observe an maintain these rights, not as flowing mere from their own good will, but as of standing and antecedent force, as well as the discipline faith or rights of the gospel. Indeed this Co stantine seems to have been a quiet, good ma who after a reign of thirty five years, refigned th kingdom to the lineal heir, Malcolm the fon his predecessor Donald, and past the remainir five years of his life among the Culdees of § This devout turn may be the real Andrews. of the different characters given him by our tv historians, of different notions in these matter Boece and Buchanan. Boece fays, he was " " man of a disposition more accommodated " civil and religious matters than to war." B Buchanan calls him "a man not fo much of " bad disposition, as not constant enough in the " which was good."

Some years after his death bring us down the reign of his fon Indulphus, (or in the o Gaelic lon-dubh, or Black John,) who, it is fai for some reason or other not mentioned, expell Bishop Fothad the First from St. Andrews, whi

the only circumstance relating to the church LETTER 1 his reign, and that too not well ascertained, nat has come to our knowledge. Perhaps the ishop, from observation of the subsequent inconmiences, had ventured to disapprove of those equent intrusions of collaterals in prejudice of e right line, now that the example of most of ie neighbouring nations began to be in favour f regular fuccession: Which may have provoked e King, otherwise not a bad man, to take this itherto unheard of step, and turn out the Bishop ho had grumbled at his coming in. However, the fact be as here supposed, it is the first exulsion of the kind that we read of in our church, nd whether just or not, has been copied by siilar fuccessors fince, and upon fimilar occasions. But be in this what may, there is a political fair ascribed to this reign, which I cannot well als over; as, however at first fight it may not ppear to be strictly connected with ecclesiastical aguiry, it touches the honour of our nation in nother respect. The laborious English antiquary Ir. Camden lighted, it feems, on an old manuript about the division of Scotland, in Lord lurleigh's library, where he met with this pafige; "Indulphus reigned eight years: In his time the city Eden was evacuated, and left to the Br. p. 689.

Scots to this day: From which he infers that he city of Edinburgh had been all-along in poffion of the Anglo-Saxons, and came only unler the Scottish dominion so far down as the year 160. This discovery of Camden's was first made ise of to the same purpose by Archbishop Usher, Ush Prim. md after him by some other English and Irish Him b. iii. writers, particularly by Mr. Collier, and by the Pt. 198. Bishop of St. Asaph, both of whom make Cam- p. 45. Aa2

LETTER den's Latin, which I have given the literal tr lation of, to run, that the city of Edinburgh delivered up by the English at this time, and fooner, to the Scots. On the other hand, critical enquirer Mr. Innes has favoured the lic with a fight of this manuscript out of the Crit. Essay, bertine library, from which we learn that I p. 604,783. neth Macalpin, a hundred years before this ti had fix times defeated the Saxons, and be Dunbar and Melross which they had seized. confirm this account, Mr. Innes brings the timony of Giraldus Cambrensis, and of the thor of the Polychronicon to prove, that Keni was master of all the territories from the Fi to the Tweed, from which he concludes that most that can be made of this famous pas is, "that the town Eden or Edinburgh had l taken from the Scots after Kenneth's time, " was now rendered back to Indulphus." Mr. Goodall goes deeper to work, that he overthrow Camden's inference. He will not low the Eden spoken of to be our Edinburgh there is nothing in the passage itself, nor concurrent authority, to force this interpreta but supposes it to have been some other pl perhaps Carlisle upon the river Eden in C berland, where our King David the First kep court about the time that this manuscript m have been written. Or, if it must be our E burgh, as the evacuation of it is not attrib to any particular possessors, it might have either by the Picts, who, we know, wer Bede's time, the proprietors of these parts, might have kept possession of this strong hole now: Or by the Danes, who were now hara

the country; and not by the English, who ire entirely out of the question. And in-LETTER this last supposition seems to bid fairest ing the case. As for more than a hundred before this era, the Danes had been ravag-introduct. e English territories, especially in the Norcounties, and were fo troublesome to the too, that our histories tell us this very King hus lost his life at Cullen in the Boyn, by hands, after he had driven them out of all outhern parts of the kingdom. So that the whole there is nothing in this passage, it more authentic than it is, to warrant the uction which these English writers would be g upon it: And I may be excused, for takus notice of it; as, weak tho' it be, it has made use of to support a cause, in which the r of our national church is concerned, and will come in course, and with propriety, confideration afterwards.

out this time we find in the succession of the s of St. Andrews, according to Fordun, vood and Ruddiman, a Kellach II. fon of ig, of whom it is faid, that "he was the t who went to Rome for confirmation." short account of Bishop Kellach, tho' but y touched at by our historians, furnishes hurch annals with an article of some imace, if not in itself, yet in its consequences; this man's unprecedented devotion had bly opened a door for the tyrannical pretenof the church of Rome in after-times to imupon our Bishops as necessary, what had begun by one of them out of a voluntary, nistaken piety. The succeeding ages of our h are full of these impositions: And while, ing thro' the transactions of them, we cannot

LETTER not but lament the miserable oppression which our Bishops, for the most part aged men, so fre quently endured, in being obliged to take fue long, dangerous, and expensive journeys, we may likewise see how watchful the church of Rome has always been to lay hold of the smallest pretence to increase her usurped authority, and by what eafy and unfuspected steps she gradually rose to that intolerable height of domination, which at last made a revolt from her so absolutely necessary. Our Scottish church had long subsisted without any fuch visits for confirmation of episcopal powers, no less than five hundred years, even from the mission of Palladius, to the time of this Bishop Kellach. Yea, the church of Rome herfelf had not for a long time thought fuch a piece of attendance necessary, even from Bishops with whom she might be supposed to have had more immediate concern than with ours. Bed. lib. ii. I tells us, that forty years after the mission of cap. 17. 18. Augustin into Britain, the then Pope Honorius fent two palls to the two Metropolitans of Canterbury and York, with liberty to them to confecrate one another, and in his letters to Edwin, King of the Northumbrians, and to Honorious, Bishop of Canterbury, gives this as his reason for so doing, "that he was led to this condescension from the " confideration of the great distance by land and " fea between them, and that no damage or incon-" venience might befall the British churches " from fuch avocations, but that the devotion of "the christian people might be more and more " promoted." This was then thought a valid reason, and it was certainly a standing one. The distances between Britain and Rome were still the fame, and the inconveniences accidental to the journey, which the Pope then was afraid of would rather increase than be removed, by the LETTER course of time. He does indeed speak of conlescension, and thereby seems to infinuate that he and a right to act otherwise, which is only talking n a stile then become familiar to the Roman ontiffs. But the reasons of his condescension are he main point to be taken notice of, as he therey declares that the good of the church is preerable to any personal right, whether inherent or assumed. These were the sentiments of the Roman church in those days; and sentiments too which well become the character she has so long aken to herfelf, of being the mother and mifress of all churches. But the Popes in afterimes, who so imperiously summoned the British Bishops, whenever they pleased, to Rome or Avignon, or wherever they kept their court, for confecration or confirmation, paid no regard to he spiritual interests of the church, nor to the ncrease of the people's devotion, but buried the ender affection of the mother in the haughty commands of the mistress. It was no wonder herefore that the churches of Britain, having fo ong groaned under the rigorous exercise of such power, and for fo many years feen their spiriual concerns neglected, and their temporal goods valted by their subjection to it, did at last begin o enquire into the foundation of a claim which rad been so prejudicial to them: A claim which, hey foon discovered had no original right to upport it, and had not been enforced for many rears after their respective settlements, but had mly been progressively yielded to, rather thro' the misfortunes of the intermediate times, than from any strength of its own merits. And this discovery at last produced an event in Britain, by which the influence of the church of Rome was wound-

LETTER wounded in the tenderest part, and which for tha XII. reason she cries out so bitterly against to this ver \sim day.

Such, we see, have been the consequences o this old Bishop Kellach's jaunt to Rome; con fequences, which very probably the man himself did not design, and which perhaps might never have been heard of, if a continued course of ambition on the one fide, and of ignorance or timidity on the other, had not paved the way for them. Before this time, what they called pilgrimages to Rome, from the Western parts, had been very customary: And Rome herself had set the example. Her devotees had very early begun, even in Jerom's time and before it, to flock in pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and the other famous places of what they called the Holy Land. There was a mighty stress laid upon these religious journeys, which began to be looked upon as highly meritorious, for promoting the increase of piety, and obtaining pardon of all former offences. Ye many times they were attended with great inconveniences, and exposed the travellers to many needless risks and spiritual hazards, as appear from a differtation which Gregory Nyssen wrote on the subject, and on which the Abbé Fleur remarks that, tho' Gregory does not blame fucl pilgrimages in general, yet from his own perso nal observation, he found no edification by them Fleur, hist. but rather suspected many pernicious consequence from them, "which, fays Fleury, has been the " opinion of the good and wife in all ages."-However the spirit of pilgrimage still kept up and the infection catched our island in course But as the holy land was at too great a distance and had fallen into infidel hands before our people had been much acquainted with other parts

Ecclef.l.17. $ 49.

e world, they stopt at Rome, and were made LETTER believe, that to visit and salute the tomb of the XII. at St. Peter the Prince of the Apostles, which they were always put in mind of, was equal-neritorious, and would be as acceptable, as if paid their devotions at the very places which been sanstified by the presence of Christ him.

been fanctified by the presence of Christ him-And when such travellers from such a poor, a, fimple church as ours was at that time, bethe stately pomp and glaring magnificence of Roman Pontiff, which even then was more the grandeur of a King, than the primitive slicity of a Bishop, they would return full of iration of the fine things they had feen, (as e often fays was the case with many of his itrymen,) and might think that the countenand fanction of fo great a man as the Pope, ld be of mighty service to strengthen their acter, and support their authority at home.-Popes too, we may conclude, would at first, for some time, be at pains to cherish this noof their own importance, by any little notice indefcention which they faw would pleafe thefe igers, till in end, and by repeated occasions, long studied scheme was brought to perfecwhen we shall find them treating their once hren Bishops with all the contempt and superus arrogance that ever any despotic tyrant ed to the most abject of his slaves. But I no farther anticipate this unpleasant disco-. It will too often give rife to fuch difagreereflections, therefore I shall add no more at '

I ever am, &c.

ent.

LETTER XIII.

LETTER XIII.

Beornelm, a Scottish Bishop, invited to an Engli Council, to defend the Marriage of the Clergy— Historical Account of the Controversy on that Su ject——Reasons against the Celibacy imposed the Church of Rome.

Come now to take notice of an affair, whi made some noise in the neighbouring chur of England; and as one of our Scottish Bishe had a concern in it, falls properly enough und our present consideration. About the middle the tenth century, one Dunstan, who stands the English kalendar as a faint, had been tak from the monastic profession, and advanced the see of Canterbury by the interest of Ki Edgar, whom Dunstan with his Monks, wh Abbot of Glastenbury, had assisted to rob his der brother Edwy of his dominions, and to mouthe throne in his stead.* Being now at the he

^{*} This is that Edgar, of whom the English historians tell ridiculous story, that he obliged eight of his tributary Kin among whom they say Kenneth King of the Scots was one, a of the head of the English church, and madly LETTER attached to monkery, this Dunstan formed a re- XIII. solution to expel all the secular clergy, who were mostly married men, from their livings, and inhad his favourite Monks in their rooms. was a work of great difficulty, and the married dergy defended their right a long time both by argument and prescription, till in end, by the weight of Edgar's authority feconding Dunstan's profecution, they lost the cause, and were turned out. However, upon Edgar's death they renewd their claim, and had so much interest as to get a council called to meet at Calne in Wilthire in the year 978, to debate the controversy To this council they invited a Scottish Bishop Beornelm (whom the monkish writer of Dunstan's life calls a man of elocution) to strength- Coll. Hist: on their party, and plead for them. By the affillance of this Bishop of ours they maintained their ground with great vigour, and overset Dunfan by the force of their reasoning, till the floor of the affembly room, whether by contrivance or acident, falling in, and hurting the most of the company except Dunstan and his party, decided the cause against them, by the alledged interpostion of heaven on Dunstan's side. However, the circumstance of our Bishop Beornelm's being sent for to the council, and the part of the controversy whom, they further fay, Edgar gave all the Lothians for his attendance) to row him in his barge on the river Dee in Chehire, in token of their subjection to him. But this subjection, as far as our nation is concerned, has been clearly proved to be nothing more than the customary homage which our Kings even then paid to the Kings of England for Cumberland and other lands in the North of England, which these Kings gave to ours for their assistance against the Danes.

B b 2

which

LETTER which he espoused, sufficiently shew what the sen-XIII. timents of the Scottish church were on the subject of the marriage of the clergy. And as this fub. ject has long been matter of much raillery and invective on the part of the Romanists against our clergy, it may be proper on this occasion to take a fuller view of it, and to lay before you at once all that needs be faid on this, one of the many points in dispute between them and us.

> It is not necessary to examine this controverted affair by rules of scripture, tho' one should think, it looks rather favourably towards our side, that God chose his first Priests out of the married class, and continued the succession by the use of that institution. I do not indeed lay much stress upon this, but only wish to put our adverfaries in mind of a circumstance which, if it had been as much in their favour as it is in ours, they would not have failed to make use of against But the truth is, they do not fo much as pretend the authority of scripture for their prohibition; and their canon law itself, as compiled by Gratian, and argued from by one of their great orators in the council of Trent, John à Ludegna, allows that "the marriage of the clergy is nei-"ther forbidden by the Mosaic nor Evangelic " law, but only by the constitutions of the " church, and that if it were not for these re-" straints, the clergy might lawfully marry." It is therefore on ecclefiastical authority solely that this affair rests. So it will be proper to enquire how things stand upon this foundation.

> In the primitive times of persecution we have but little information whether the clergy were married or not. The terrible hardships to which they were then exposed, might be, as the Apostle hints, a prudential inhibition against it. Yet even LETTER then we read in Polycarp's letter to the Philippians of a Presbyter Valens who had a wife. That ~ Tertullian, not withstanding of his austerities, and feeming bias another way, was married, is certain from his letters to his wife, in several passages of which it appears that he lived with her as fuch. St. Cyprian too was married, and lived with his wife after being in holy orders, as we learn from his Deacon Pontius who writes his life, and fays of him that "neither his poverty nor the perfua-" fions of his wife could induce him to look after "his estate." In the Dioclesian perfecution we read of a Phileas, Bishop of Thimouis in Egypt, whom at his martyrdom the heathen judge folicited to recant and fave his life, out of pity to his wife and children. The first public notice that feems to have been taken of the clergy's way of living, is in the provincial council of Eliberis in Spain, about the beginning of Constantine's reign, where the twenty feventh canon ordains, "that " no Bishop or other clerk shall have a stranger "woman in his house, but only a fister or daugh-"ter, and them too either virgins or dedicated "to God." The thirty third canon appoints that "Bishops, Priests and Deacons, and all clergy "that are in office shall abstain from their wives "under pain of deposition." The nineteenth bears, that "if it be discovered that a Bishop, "Priest, or Deacon has committed adultery fince "his ordination, he shall not receive the com-"munion even at the point of death," where the particular mention of adultery feems to im-Ply that they were married. This council of Eliberis, Fleury says is the oldest of which we Hist. Eccl. have any canons of discipline extant. The canons 1.9. 6ea.15. called

Canon iii. or vi. according to different editions.

LETTER called Apostolical, which the not so old as XIII. title bears, are allowed to be a collection o observances of the three first centuries, an fuch are received, the first fifty of them at least the church of Rome, ordain "Let not a Bi " Priest, or Deacon put away his wife u

" pretence of religion: If he does, let his " fuspended from communion, and deposed " persists." Here is a manifest hardship put on the clergy, and a temptation thrown in By one canon they are forbidden to away their wives out of their houses, and by ther they are commanded to abstain from th which shews either that both these canons not of universal use, or that there was some i pretation used to reconcile them to one anoth

Thus matters stood as to the married clere the time of the great council of Nice, where third canon forbids Bishops, Priests, or Dea " to keep any women by way of housekee " unless it be a mother, sister, aunt, or c " unfuspected person." The historians say, the council proposed to go further, and to r a law to debar the clergy from the use of: riage altogether, when Paphnutius Bishop of bais in Egypt, who had been a confessor in late perfecution, and was an unmarried man, i up in the midst of the assembly, and strenus argued against such an intolerable imposition. on which the Council followed his advice, made no new regulation, but left the fer churches to the free use of their former custon this particular. Accordingly the two church storians Socrates and Sozomen tell us, that in ny parts of the Eastern Church, even Bishops children by their wives after their confecrati of which the annals of these times give us fundry LETTER instances. One of the Bishops of the Council of XIII. Nice, Spyridion, Bishop of Tremethus in Cyprus, who was famous for his piety and other episcopal qualifications, had a wife and children. Old Gre-Sozom. gory of Nazianzum was a married man, and by the chronology feems to have had two fons, the great Gregory and Cefarius, after he was made Gregory Bishop of Nissa, St. Basil's bro- Naz. carm: ther, had a wife Theofebia, and lived with her ill her death, as appears by Nazianzen's confolatory letter to him on that occasion, in which he alls her " the worthy wife and companion of a "Bishop." But the case of the philosopher Synefius is particularly remarkable. The church of Prolemais had made choice of this man for their Bishop, and had applied regularly to Theophilus. Patriarch of Alexandria, for his confent. hus, alarmed at this proposal, made the following public protestation; "I have a wife, whom I re-" ceived from God by the sacred hands of Theo-"philus, and I declare that I will neither leave "her, nor converse with her in private like an " adulterer, for I wish to have virtuous children "in great plenty." This declaration shews the difference both of opinions and practices at that ime. Yet fuch was the worthiness of the man's character, that Theophilus and the other Bishops ordained him Bishop of Ptolemais, in which office be behaved himself with the strictest decorum. and was famous for the regularity both of his public discipline, and private conversation.

In this state of liberty allowed by the counal of Nice, the Eastern church continued till the year 692, when the council in Trullo, as it is called, established that rule which has served

LETTER the Greek and Eastern churches ever fince, XIII. allowing the marriage of the inferior clergy b fore, but prohibiting it after, ordination. In t West the usage was for some time pretty mu the same, as may be gathered both from Ambrose and Jerom. In the year 385 Pope ry, that has come down to us under the title ricius published an ordinance (the first, says Fle Hist. Eccl. Decretals) forbidding the clergy to marry aft ordination, or to use the marriage contracted be fore. This prohibition was renewed some fer years after by Innocent I. but with this provi fion, "that fuch as had not heard of the decree " of Pope Siricius should be excused for their "ignorance, if they abstained for the future" Which shews that it was only the force of that late decree that was binding on them: For if celibacy had been long fettled in the church even by ecclefiastic authority, and become the standing discipline, none could have pleaded or deserved pardon for their ignorance. However, notwithstanding of these new decretals, liberties were still used in various remote parts of the West for a long time: And tho' the monastic orders, after they came in, did what they could to bring an odium upon the fecular clergy, as they began then to be distinguished, and to disparage both their character and function on the score of marriage, wherever they met with that handle, yet the married clergy stood their ground long, as we see from this very instance in our own island. For, notwithstanding of the keenness and severity of Dunstan and his monkish successors in the see of Canterbury, it cost many a fynod at home, and many a thundering order from Rome, to bring things to the state they were in at the reformation. About a hundred years after Dunstan's LETTER time, Pope Gregory VII. well known by the name of Hildebrand, published a decree that the clergy who lived in concubinage or incontinence (for fo he calls marriage, to fix the greater odium on it) should not be capable to perform any part of the facred function, and immediately fent this decree into Germany. On which the clergy there took the alarm, crying out against it as a manifest herefy, contrary to scripture and primitive practice, and threatning to leave their offices rather than be deprived the company of their wives. The Pope's two agents, Sigfroy Archbishop of Mentz, and Altman Bishop of Passau, thought to have brought the clergy into compliance: But their attempts were to no purpose, and themselves had well nigh been torn to pieces for proposing it. The Pope on this wrote letter after letter to the feveral Bishops of these parts, proving from no other authority than the commands of some of his own predecessors, that the clergy ought to live without marriage: And in a letter to all the laity of Germany in general, he exhorts them by all means to hinder the married clergy from ferving at the altar, and even to use force against them if need be, which at the same time he owns is a new method, to inforce the observation of the canons by the help of the fecular arm. However the clergy kept their wives still, and when Sigfroy of Mentz, who was otherwise a resolute man, made another attempt against them, he met with fo much opposition, that he gave up the bufinels, and resolved never to meddle more in it, but leave the profecution of it to the Pope's own power.

CC. 34.

In England, Lanfranc of Canterbury pushed the C c Pope's

LETTER Pope's orders against the marriage of the clers

XIII. with great vigour, in a fynod at Winchester, ✓ did Anselm after him in a synod at London.-And yet after all, Pope Paschal II. found it nece fary to allow this very Anselm to ordain the for of Priests, because, as the Pope's dispensation ex pressly bears, "major pene et melior clericorun " pars in hac specie censeatur," the greater and more valuable part of the clergy were of this class Which shews the prevalency of the custom ever then, in spite of all the assaults it had sustained and likewise proves that these sons had been born to their fathers when in orders, otherwise there needed no dispensation. Nor was this practice peculiar to the Southern parts of our island. Mr. Goodall, in his preface to Bishop Keith's cata logue, has made it clear from unquestionable authorities, that our Culdees married as they please ed, and had revenues and possessions in property. which after their deaths went to their wives and children: And tho' this part of their character be laid hold of to shew that they differed from the then church, and so were not of prelatical prin ciples, yet it is certain that the married clergy it other places many times took the fame liberty of transmitting even their revenues to their child ren, as appears from the histories of these times and from the many monkish complaints, and re peated decrees of fynods against it. However the grievous hardships which the clergy suffered of account of marriage, and the continued ordinance of the Popes, who never lost fight of a favourit project when once started, prevailed so far 2 last, that the clergy were obliged to yield, an either chose or were constrained to live single, all the Romish clergy do at this day. Aft

r this historical detail of the fact, let us LETTER

zason a little upon the point. It must sure- XIII. cknowledged that both the partial kind of indulged to the Eastern church, and the hibition forced at last upon the Western. deviation from the moderation and regard ice that was observed by the council of which made no universal law about this afcause, as Fleury justly remarks, "in those they did not make canons to introduce new tices at the risk of being ill-observed, but to confirm the antient usages of Apostolic ition." And indeed this new introduction Fleur. hift. ig and heavily complained of, not only by Ecclef.l. 14. good and great men at the time, who made of marriage themselves, but even by fundry writers fince the establishment of the present y in that church, who wish the Popes had in so violent and peremptory in it. No the patrons of it can produce many speciough arguments in its vindication. r concern and anxiety incident to the marite is a strong prudential motive to keep it: But it is not peculiar to the clergy. ity run the fame risk, and are exposed to ne inconvenience. If marriage be lawful as an Apostle seems to think, and the Rohave not denied, it might have been left all: And people's own prudence and inon would have directed them, whether of or laity, as to the expediency of going inor not. But where the Romanists cry out h about the cares of a family, and so high-I the difinterestedness of an unmarried state, end the celibacy of the clergy, the argunowever specious, is neither founded in rea-C c 2 fon,

LETTER fon, nor confonant even to their own experies XIII. To be difinterested or otherwise, depends on inward disposition, more than on external circ stances: And numberless instances can be proed of hospitable, beneficent men in all condition who have wives and families, and of fordid mi who have none. It is urged that a clergyn out of the church-goods allotted to him, ou to provide for, and be charitable to the poor are Christ's members: But to this, fay they, having a family of his own, is and will be a great hindrance. And may it not be answer that it is as great a virtue, if there be any vir in these things, to raise up a new race of m bers to Christ, under a prospect of such provis as to take care of those already existent, and may be otherwise provided for? But the truth that while human nature continues what we it, a clergyman who has it in his power, wil cording to the bent of his disposition, lay up his friends and relations, if he has any, and be inclined to look upon them in the same as if they were his own children. And f proof of this we may appeal to the churc Rome herself. The Popes nephews, as they called, are always handsomely provided for, many a poor man has come to be a Prince his connection with an unmarried churchma Not only so, but fathers of children, by the mish constitution, may be and have been Po Witness Alexander VI. and his Borgias. he have done more for his children than he or been more interested in taking care of the had they been born to him during his Poped This then at best is but a foolish and ur

ranted plea: And therefore the Romanists

1 the virtue of continence, and the merito- LETTER ity of a state of celibacy. Hence come XIII. fneers and contemptuous language thrown inst marriage in general, which amount to is than blaipheming a divine institution, furely very inconsistent with their own saal definition of it, as it undoubtedly has e appearance to deny the clergy the use thing which they believe to be a facrand in so far a mean of conveying grace. if the continence which they prescribe 1 a valuable virtue, were it not better that d be voluntary and of free choice, not imby force and terror upon the inclination, ertainly tends to lessen the merit of it. the whole, the conduct of the Nicene fahighly commendable and worthy of imito leave every national or feparate church own liberty in this matter, and at freedom late fuch practices as the divine law has trained, in a way most conducive to piety fication. This, we have feen, was the rule d in the primitive times, when clergymen l or not, as they faw expedient, either for fafety or public benefit. The church of may have reasons for her practice, and hurches may have equally as good reasons irs. There may be inconveniencies in a I state, and there may be temptations in y. And no human injunctions can remove e, or guard against the other. I know the uists will evade every argument on our side from reason or fact, by flying to the paat authority of the church, and telling us fter the Pope's positive decision, all former fupposed liberties are at an end.

LETTER is shifting the cause, and slying off to another fiels XIII. of debate. We deny this prerogative, and appea to the general determination of the council c Nice, which, we fay, is of universal extent and applicable to the present case, "Let the ar "tient customs continue:" Not such customs c any kind as the Romish church has in latter time brought in, by her usurped dominion, and would be passing upon the world for antient, but such customs as were antient at that time, by having been in use from the beginning. On this definition of antiquity we rest our plea, and think it neither necessary nor becoming to be throwing back, as we well could, upon the pretended continence of the Romish clergy, the indecent scoffs which they throw out against the avowed marriage Whether those first reformers who had been bound down by the then customary vows of chastity, as it is impertinently called, were culpable or not, in breaking these bonds and claiming the original liberties of mankind, is another queltion, which comes not under our present consideration: Tho' if it did, we cannot think the cause of the reformation in any danger from it, as long as we have the confession of the Romanists themfelves, when put in mind of the scandalous lives of fo many of their Popes, that the private faults of the man do not hurt his public character, nor affect either the soundness of his doctrine, or authority of his decisions, if otherwise good and agreeable to the proper standard.

I am, &c.

LETTER

Lettėr XIV.

LETTER XIV.

Change of the regal Succession by Kenneth III. and Murder of his Nephew Malcolm———His Repentance and Application to the Bishops and Clergy——Accession of Malcolm II. who founded an Episcopal See at Mortlich, afterwards removed to Aberdeen——Restections on his Bounty to the Church, and that of his great Grandson Malcolm III.——Character of that King, and of his Queen St. Margaret.

TOWARDS the close of the tenth century, the annals of our nation present us with the unhappy affair of King Kenneth the III. having had a hand, as is said, in the death of his nephew Malcolm, who was son to his elder brother, the good King Dussus, and consequently heir of the crown. It was this Kenneth who got the order of the regal succession, changed from the confused way in which it had gone for so many years, and been productive of so many intestine commotions, and brought to that regular and hereditary form of going directly to the nearest heir, which continued ever after. To make room

LETTER room for the fuccession of his own fon M XIV. colm, according to this new regulation, he pr cured the other Malcolm, who had the bett title, to be poisoned. Being otherwise a go man, as well as a great King, this feems at la to have born heavy on his conscience, and k him to apply to the Bishops and clergy for the ghostly advice and assistance. And here in B chanan's narration of this affair, we have a famp of that regard to the facred character which I was ready to display on all occasions. "did not (he fays,) prescribe to him the true r " medy from the doctrine of Christ, for they be " already fallen off from the piety and learning " of the ancients, but enjoined him these stup " notions of vifiting fuch and fuch holy place Buch hist. " kissing relicts, and the like." Now, grantin that the clergy had ordered these outward pe formances by way of penance, which, by the b were equally as proper marks of obedience discipline, as standing in a white sheet, or being mounted on a scaffold in a kirk, how did B chanan know that they had neglected to p him in mind of the true remedy? His auth Boece had given him no handle for this malic ous aspersion: He says, "the Bishop Movean " advised the King to repent of his crime, teach "ing him that, if he continued in repentance "he should find the wrath of God appealed "That God was provoked by the fins of me " but would be inclined to mercy by repentant " and works of piety. By which advice the Kir " being encouraged, began to repent, to visit h

" ly places, to relieve the poor, to honour t " clergy, and in a word omitted nothing th " could be thought worthy of a pious and tr

lib. vi. ia

reg. 80.

" ly christian King:" this is Boece's account of LETTER the clergy's behaviour on this trying occasion, XIV. and Buchanan had it before him. Was it fair in him then not only to conceal the advice of Bishop Hist. lib. zi. Moveanus, than which I question if even the general affembly where Mr. George fat Moderator could have given a better, but likewife roundly to affirm that they took no notice of repentance at all, and only recommended these external marks of devotion, which from the account that Boece gives of it, the penitent King appears to have added of his own head, and as voluntary proofs of his obedience. Archbishop Spotswood makes Hist. b. 16. the same observation, that the King did "not p. 27. " think by these outward deeds to make expia-"tion for his fin, as notwithstanding of the su-" perstitions that were then beginning to creep "into the church, people were still taught that " Christ is the only propitiation for sin, and that " by his blood only the guilt of it is washed "away." If it shall be faid, as I doubt not but it will, that the Archbishop may be suspected of partiality in the clergy's favour, it will be acknowledged, I hope, that Buchanan's testimony is fully as suspicious on the other side: With this difference, that Buchanan bespatters them without any authority for so doing, and the Bishop's vindication of them feems at least to have Boece for his warrant.

Yet this same Buchanan is sometimes obliged to speak well of the clergy even of those days, or at least can find nothing from whence to indulge his humour of speaking ill of them. For within a few years after Kenneth's death, who was treacherously murdered at Fettercairn, when A. D. 994-Grimus a Prince of the royal blood was, not
D d with-

LETTER withstanding of the late regulation, contendan XIV. with Kenneth's fon Malcolm for the crown, Bucha nan tells us, after Boece and the other historians. that Bishop Fothad laboured incessantly between them, and at last by his intercession got a peace concluded upon conditions. This was certainly a good work, and worthy of a christian Bishop. Does Buchanan commend him for it? No: All he fays of him is, that "he was a man of great " authority among the people, because of the " opinion of his fanctity," and leaves it to his reader, from what he had faid of the Bishops before, to infer what it was that this opinion was founded upon. He had nothing in this procedure of Fothad's to blame him for, but he takes care to lower his character as much as he well could. He would not fay of him what Boece had faid, and in no despicable Latin too, that he was " maximus Scotorum Episcopus, vir summa vir-"tute præditus et clementia," the chief Bishop of the Scots, and a man of confummate virtue and peaceableness, but ascribes all his authority among the people to their opinion of his fancity; an opinion founded, as he would infinuate, on that attachment to superstitious trisles, which he had charged upon all the Bishops in the affair of Kenneth. I cannot avoid taking notice, as I go along, of these artful strokes of Buchanan's pen, if it were only to shew, what some people will hardly bear to be told, that he is neither in his affertions infallible, nor in his descriptions of some men and things quite beyond suspicion.

About ten or twelve years after Kenneth's death, and in terms of the agreement with Grimus, his fon Malcolm, the second of the name, ascended the throne. And this accession opens up to us

ind of new scene, both in the settlement of LETTER state, and in the concerns of the church.— XIV. herto the civil constitution had assumed a pear fort of form, unheard of in any neighbournation, as being neither properly elective, nor tly hereditary. How this form had been inluced among the Scots at first, is not easy to liscovered, and writers have differed very much ut it, according to their different notions and ciples of government. Some attribute it to decision of the states, and cry it up as a most ellent and equitable plan, tho' they do not us who or what formed these states, and auised their decisions. Others are of opinion, the fuccession of collaterals had been only gned to take place while the lineal heir was er age, or otherwise incapable to govern, and inclined to look upon every other case as no This difference of fentier than usurpation. it gives little fatisfaction as to the reason of thing, and leaves us under the necessity of ng the fact in general, without being able to e upon it one way or other. Only this much warrantably enough be faid, that, after the experience of what disorders and broils the form had occasioned, it was no wonder that fe and judicious prince should both wish and avour to have these inconveniences removed, ettling the fuccession upon a more permanent incontestible basis. And it is indeed matter thy of observation, that amidst all the confuincident to the old form, from the ambiof collaterals and cabals of their adherents, succession should still have been preserved in eldest line of Fergus MacErch, whom our orians call Fergus II. thro' fo many hundred Dd 2

XIV. fin's death, whether by nature or violence, the undoubted representative of that el branch, and the lineal heir of the Scor crown. How far this alteration made by his ther, and begun in his person, was preserable the former wandering and uncertain schemay be seen now, tho' the argument could hold then, from comparing the state of this since with what it was before their time, a placing the order and uniformity of the one prod over against the confusion and irregularity the other.

But, besides this visible change, which certain was to the better, on the face of our state-affa we begin now to perceive a change gradu arifing in the outward constitution of our chur but whether to the better or worse, I shall: take upon me to fay; let consequences del Before this time, we have heard of Bishop among us possessed of lands and heritas but the Bishop of St. Andrews, as coming the place of the old Pictish Bishop of Abernet And it is no doubt on this account that we have been so often told, that before this period, kingdom was not divided into what are n called Dioceses. But in this reign, a provis was begun for that purpose, which under s ceeding Kings was continued and increased, at last and by degrees that distribution was co pleated, under which, with a few interruptic our church subsisted in a diocesan form to abolition of established Episcopacy, and sett up of Presbytery in the end of the last centu This Malcolm II. was a brave and magnanim Prince, and fought many battles with the Da rith various success, till at last by the blessing of LETTER eaven he gave them a total and final overthrow XIV. ta place called Murthilack, now Mortlich, near ie banks of the river Spey. In acknowledgeent of which deliverance, he founded, in the ear 1010, a Bishop's seat at this place, and enued it with the lands of Murthilac, Cloveth and lunmeth. The first Bishop of this new erection, y the civil authority, was Beanus or Beyn, who t the King's desire, says my author, was pro-Scotichron. to this honour by Pope Benedict VIII. and had all the country between Dee and Spey lotted to him for his diocese. This is the seand erection of the kind, next to St. Andrews, hich we have account of in our Scottish history. lut we are not to suppose that the other parts of ie kingdom had no Bishops among them, or at these other Bishops had not particular portions f the country assigned them, on which to bestow eir immediate labours. Bishop Beyne's Epispal jurisdiction would be confined between Dee id Spey: What should become of the christian sople on the other fides of these two rivers? The ence of history as to such particulars is no more 1 argument for the promiscuous government of shops, than it is for the promiscuous ministram of the inferior clergy—Yet we are told that e clergy did not officiate promiscuously: One the laws made by Constantine, son of Kenneth acalpin, orders the clergy to reside upon their arges: Confequently they had charges to refide And is it not prefumable that this regulam expressed in such general terms, included the ishops as well as the inferior clergy? So that hat King Malcolm did at this time was not for auch an alteration of, or incroachment upon the LETTER old plan, as a devout donation of a fettled living XIV. in perpetuity to the Bishop who had the chart of these bounds, and to testify his thankfulne for the victory at Mortlich, by thus dedicating the lands about it to sacred uses.

It was this Malcolm who, according to all ou histories and records, first gave away his land to the nobility, in heritage to them and theirs fo ever. An act of generofity, no doubt, or grati tude, call it which you will: But an act at the same time which he lived long enough to repen of, as the exigencies of his government foon laid him under the necessity of seizing again some o these lands by methods which historians say, were none of the most justifiable: On which Fordu makes this short, but judicious reflection, "In " consulté satis sit illa donatio quam necessari " fequitur donorum repetitio," it is certainly rash and ill-judged donation which needs to b fo foon recalled. Now if he was the first wh gave lands to the laity, as is generally believed it is not to be thought that the church had been univerfally enriched with fuch gifts before, other wife we should have heard of it either from the murmurings of the nobles, or the pen of the historian. But except what we have been tol of the liberality of Kenneth Macalpin and his fur ceffors to the fee of St. Andrews, which is related ed in very general terms, we know little of th outward state of the church in other parts of the kingdom. Whereas from this present period down ward we meet with charters and deeds of gi from Kings and Nobles to Bishops and Abbots, t cathedral churches and monasteries, distinctly pressed and carefully preserved thro' a course fucceeding generations. And this fo visible diff

ren

may be accounted for, I think, from the LETTER ing confideration; and indeed can be well XIV. nted for no other way.

the intelligence we have of these matters is from our oldest historians, such as Fordun, on, Bowmaker, &c. or from such of the chares of monasteries as escaped the ravages of rd Longshanks, and the sury of the Resorm-

Now, as Mr Innes observes, the most of chartularies were writs of foundation, doi, or other conveyances of the temporal poss and lands of the churches and abbeys, indeed was all the design of them; for in respects they give very little light into the ffairs of the church: and the monkish writthose times were mostly taken up with these ral concerns likewise. So that after such ions had been begun and carried on from o time, we meet with a connection of church y, fuch as it is, in a chronological feries, regular detail of fuch events as principally fled the writers attention. Whereas before ime they had little to fay; not indeed for of matter in general, but of fuch matter as hought most worth the while of rememberid handing down to posterity. Hence may urifen the opinion which has to much prevailat till the time of Malcolm II. there were tinct dioceses in Scotland; as if no episcoarge deserved the name of a diocese, unless lands and temporal endowments confer-And after this period, what is our n-history but a continued repetition of sebustle and contention among Kings, Popes, lishops about lands and rights and privileges it kind, carried on with all the zeal and

LETTER earnestness that would have become a better cank XIV. Little or nothing is to be met with, about the promotion of true piety, about faith or doctrin or any of these old primitive concerns which we for a long time called the effentials of religion-Yet this defect in our ecclesiastical history w not peculiar to our church: It was the gener characteristic of the times. These were, as the are called, ages of darkness and ignorance, owin no doubt, to fome new cause which preceeding ages had not been acquainted with, and white perhaps might be found, if impartially foug after, in the worldly incumbrances of lands at tenements begun to be laid upon our church this time.

This great King and benefactor to the church Mclcolm II. was at last murdered by a gang conspirators at Glammis, and succeeded by b A.D. 1034. grandson Duncan, in whose short reign we me with no particular account of church-matters-He was traitorously slain by his cousin Macbet who usurped the crown, and kept possession it feventeen years. In the chartulary of St. A drews we find "a gift by Macbeth fon of Fin " lay and Gruoch daughter of Bodhe, King at "Queen of the Scots, of Kirkeness with all i " pertinents, to the Keledees of Lochlevin, for the " benefit of their prayers." The bloody tyra could be charitable or liberal out of the spo of usurpation, and he stands on record in t number of royal benefactors upon this account Might it not be asked, if it was right in these ho men to have accepted any donation from fuch hand; and might not the rightful Sovereign ha revoked it without falling under the common i putation of facrilege? At last Macbeth was ated in battle, and killed in his flight by Mac-LETTER uff Thane of Fife, and the true heir Malcolm XIV. I. called Canmore, restored to the possession of is father's throne.

This King largely improved upon the example A.D. 1057. t by his great grand-father Malcolm II. of muincence to the church, and further enlarged the iocelan form by the endowing of two new ishopricks, those of Moray and Caithness, and storing the two old ones of Glasgow, and Vhitehern which he ordered to be called Galway. The first of these two, the bishopric of lasgow, as we have already seen, had been ormed five hundred years before this, by Kentiern or St. Mungo, but it feems had been fo mierably over-run or neglected, that we have no acounts who were Bishops in it from St. Mungo till his time. Only Mr. Collier tells us from Stubbs, bat in Edward the Confessor's time, and some ears before Malcolm Canmore's restoration, Kinus Archbishop of York ordained one Magsues irst, and then a John, to be Bishop of Glasgow, nd received an acknowledgement of his metroolitical right from them in writing: Which inframent was loft, he fays, along with other records conafter the conquest, when York was stormed ad let on fire by the Normans. The other fee of Coll. Hist. Whitehern had been begun by St. Ninian, and b.ii. p.221. n the intermediate viciflitudes of Pictish, Saxon, and Scottish possessors, had undergone the same esolation that Glasgow had suffered. Yet in this ong tract of time we are not to conclude that hristianity had been extinguished, or even the original plan of Episcopacy laid aside, tho' we have no account of the particular Bishops that governed, any more than of the particular preiby-

E e

LETTER ters or pastors who preached in these parts. now that these divisions or districts were co tenanced by this truly devout and religious Ki we shall find them, in after times, in a flourishing condition, and their Bishops making a figure our church-annals. And yet, which is not little furprising, so lame and inaccurate are th annals, that they do not tell us who were the fi Bishops of these new erections, nor indeed a thing further about them than the bare erecti of them, till some years after this King's dea that we meet with the names of the Bishops those sees, as witnesses to some charters of his st Alexander and David. How to account for t I know not. It is not rare to find an establish fee vacant for a number of years: But that an endowment should stand so long unprovided, a under fuch a religious King too, is somewl furprifing. Perhaps the former prelates who h had the overlight of these parts, before this ro interposition, might have gone on as long as the lived, in their old paths of ecclefiastical simpli ty, and retirement from worldly bufiness, and might not have been known to, or taken notice by the monkish annalists, who fought to rea nothing but what concerned their temporal in For, as I said before, it can hardly be si posed that such a Prince as this Malcolm wo have left these districts without Bishops, or t history would not have given us the names of th first Bishops of them, if there had been new or put into them; as we see was the case with Mc lich fo many years before, which on its first dowment was filled with a Beanus or Beyn.

This good King built anew the cathedral chu of Durham in England; the King himself, v

m the Bishop and Turgot the Prior, lay-LETTER: first stone. Which is an indication that XIV. Northern counties did then belong to our

He built likewise the Abbey church of Scotichron. rmline; and at last, after a reign of thirty A.D. 1093. ars, was treacherously killed at the siege of ck in Northumberland, together with his son Edward. He was a most excellent man. as a King and a christian, and was partir happy in his marriage with St. Margaret, is deservedly called, who, next to her bro-Edgar Atheling, was the true heir of the royal line, and in private life was a wo-Their lives were lmost beyond description. n soon after their death by Turgot, after-Bishop of St. Andrews, and will stand upcord, as an ornament to our nation, and imple to crowned heads in all ages.*

I am, &c.

se public character and private virtues of Queen Margawell described by Sir David Dalrymple (Lord Hailes) annals of Scotland; who concludes his account of her, om Turgot, in these words: -- " By a tedious and ul indisposition, endured with exemplary patience, she brought very low. During a short interval of ease, she atly received the communion. Soon after, her anguish dy returned with redoubled violence. She stretched heron her couch, and calmly waited for the moment of her ntion. Cold, and in the agonies of death, she ceased put up her supplications to heaven. These were some -Have mercy upon me, O God: accordto the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my injes. Make me to hear of joy and gladness, that the bones h thou hast broken may rejoice. Cast me not away from resence, and take not thy holy Spirit from me: Restore me the joy of thy salvation. The sacrifices of God are oken spirit: A broken and a contrite spirit, O God, thou

LETTER

E e 2

XV.

LETTER XV.

Accession of King Edgar—His Donation of Coldingham Abbey to the Benedictines—Account of that, and other Monastic Orders—Remarks on the various kinds of Monasteries and Monks—Account of the Croisades.

ter a few years of interruption, by his eldest surviving son Edgar, who, it is said, was anointed by Godricus Bishop of St. Andrews,

"wilt not despise. Do good, in thy good pleasure, unto Zions build thou the walls of Jerusalem.—At that moment, her son Edgar, returning from the army, approached her couch. How fares it with the King, and my Edward? The youth stood silent. I know all, cried she, I know all: By this how ly cross, by your filial affection, I adjure you, tell me the truth. He answered—Your husband, and your son, are both silent. Lifting her eyes and her hands towards heaven, the faid—Praise and blessing be to thee, Almighty God, that thou hast been pleased to make me endure so bitter anguish in the hour of my departure, thereby, as I trust, to purify so in some measure from the corruption of my sins: And thous in some measure from the corruption of my sins: And thous in some measure from the corruption of my sins: And thous in some measure from the corruption of my sins: And thous in some measure from the corruption of my sins: And thous in some measure from the corruption of my sins: And thous in some measure from the corruption of my sins: And thous it livened the world by thy death, oh deliver me—While pro-

ad was the first of our Kings who had that LETTER eremony performed upon him after the manner fother christian Princes. He gave the Abbey f Coldingham, where there had been for many ears a fanctuary for virgins, to Ranulphus, lishop of Durham, but upon the ungrateful beaviour of that Prelate, whom even the English witers represent as infamous for luxury and coruption, he recalled his gift, and erected it into priory of Benedictines. These were an order f Monks begun by one Benedict or Bennet, who was born at Nursi in Italy about the year 180, and was the first who brought the monastic ife to be esteemed in the west: and this erection of Edgar's feems to be the first introduction of what is properly to be reckoned the Monastic state, under particular rules and denominations, nto Scotland. Before this we read indeed of Monks and monasteries among us, and may be ed, without farther examination, to suppose that hey were of the same nature with what goes unler that designation in the Popish Church at this lay. But this is a mistake. These old monaseries which we hear fo much of, in the early periods of our church history, could be no other han separate societies of clergymen residing toether where they best could, under some one by ray of Superior, whether we shall call him Bishop * Abbot, and, at the command of that Superior, eady to perform their clerical functions in any place of the neighbourhood where he should see roper to employ them.

The first attempt towards what is now called Monachism was in the East, particularly in Egypt and Syria, in the time of the Decian persecution, but especially under that long and grievous scene

LETTER of cruelty carried on against the christians in those countries, by the last of the heathen tyrants, Maxi-XV. min Daia. From thence it was brought over into Europe by Athanasius, who recommended it at Rome, and by his wonderful accounts of Anthony, and the other Egyptian Monks of his acquaintance, raised an esteem for that state of retirement in the West. But these Monks were not Presbyters, as our old Culdees are faid to have been; They were mere Laymen, and so were all the Monks of those times. The first who brought Monks into holy orders in Europe, was Eusebius, Bishop of Vercelles, in the time of the Emperor Constantius. After him St. Martin introduced the practice into France, where upon his being made Bishop of Tours in Bretagne, he founded a monastery of this fort about two miles from that city. From this plantation of St. Martin's in France, and in imitation of that pattern, it is probable that this kind of Monkery was first introduced into our island. For Bede tells, us that when Augustin came to Britain, he found an old church standing, which had been dedicated to St. Martin while the Romans were masters of the Bed. lib.i.q country. Among the Southern Picts there was a Monastery of St. Martin's at Whitehern, found Cap. 26. ed by St. Ninian, who, we are told, had feen Martin, and lived some time with him on his journey to Rome. That Columba's Monastery of Hy among the Scots was after this modely may be supposed from what his biographer tells us, that among the Sunday offices in that Monal tery there used to be a prayer in commemoration mory of him as Founder of their order And in

Adamnan of St. Martin, which probably has been in me-Marianus Scotus we read, that as far down as the year is the Scottish Monks at Cologn in Ger-LETTER egarded St. Martin as the patron of their n all this we may easily infer what fort of and Monasteries it was, that first prevailed country, and out of which, even Buchays, the Bishops were chosen. They were like the early Monks who fled from pern to the defarts, and lived in caves or thuts on the labour of their hands: Nor the same character with the latter classes that title, which made fuch a noise among after times. They were what I have all-aalled them, focieties of and for the cleriofession; or, as the Bishop of St. Asaph es them, "These Monasteries were the Hist. Acc. ols and universities of those times, wherein c.vii.p.160. were bred up to religion and learning," th he gives a number of instances. These were astricted to no particular rules, but mmon rules of their profession, and went particular denomination. The title of feems to have been given them only by iters of after times, such as Fordun and more out of compliment to their own er, than in conformity to the strict proof speech. The distinction of Presbyters onks used by Fordun, Major, and the rest, a late invention of their own coining, and foundation in the general history of the ve church, or in any certain records of our ountry. The Presbyters and Monks of lays were the fame, and went by the gename of clergy, without any other mark rence. Accordingly we read of no difor contentions among them about rights

XV. fanctity, or peculiar honour of precedence.—

Whereas, after the various upftart tribes of late

Monks fwarmed in among us, under the netitles of Benedictines, Carthusans, Dominicax

Franciscans, and a vast number more, with the different habits of different colours, black, grey and white, our church histories are pestered with their disputes and debates among themselves, and with suits carried on by them against the Bishops sometimes before the Popes, sometimes in the King's courts, about lands and tythes and exemptions, and many more such uncharacteristic claims as the primitive ages had never heard of. At last, these foreign tribes of Religious, as they called themselves, assumed the specious title of Regulars, from their particular observance of such and fuch distinguishing peculiarities in living or dress, as had been forged in the brain of some morose or discontented devotee, and confirmed, for their own ends, by fucceeding Popes, as the Rule of fuch and fuch a Founder. And the old clergy, who still adhered to, and depended upon their respective Bishops, began to be called Seculars, by way of contempt, from their being, tho' in execution of their office, connected in some measure with the Seculum, the world, and there by engaged in fecular business. As if a class of men who, being both dedicated to and installed is the facred function, looked upon themselves 2 bound by, and endeavoured to walk up to the rules of Christ and his Apostles, had not as good a title to be called Regulars, if there be any ho nour in that title, as they had, who professed only a scrupulous attachment to the infignifican whit whims of a turbulent Dominic, or a capricious LETTER XV.

It is from the first appearance therefore of these faccessive clusters of new Monks, that we begin to meet with the distinction of regulars and seculars, with such a weight of preference in favour of the former, that a lay-brother of some eminent house, with nothing to recommend him but the favourite cord or cowl of his order. would meet with more esteem, and be more revered for fanctity, than the ablest and most laborious priest among the seculars or parochial clergy. Such was the devotion, or rather superstition of the Monkish ages; and so many new orders, or refinements on the old ones, were every now and then starting up over all christendom, that the lay-powers were at last obliged to interfere, and to prohibit any farther multiplication of them. How far our Kings and Bishops did right in bringing them in and encouraging them at first, is not for me to fay. No doubt they did it for the best, and had both good hopes and defigns: But they could not brefee consequences, nor guard against the corruptions which their well-intended liberality might in time occasion. However, so it is in fact, that this donation of King Edgar was the first of the kind among us, and paved the way for the many various troops of Monks that from time to time followed, and got themselves seated in the facil lodgings and most fertile grounds that were my where to be had, till in end, either their riches, or the bad use they made of them, were their ruin, and extinguished the very name of them in this island.

In this King's time too began another affair, which made a great noise for some centuries, and

LETTER has been variously thought of, according to the XV. variety of humours and views among men: I mean, these formidable expeditions to the East, for recovering the holy land out of the hands of the Mahometan infidels, which, from the adventurers wearing Croffes fewed upon their garments, were called the Croisades, and which, as it were by an universal infatuation, engaged the attention of all ranks for a long tract of time. It was in the year 1096 that the first of these expeditions was refolved on, at the earnest solicitations of the then Pope Urban, in a national council at Clermont in France. And in the year 1000 Godfrey Earl of Bouloign, who had been chosen to command the army and head the undertaking, was, after feveral fuccessful battles against the infidels in those parts, crowned King of Jerusalem; but did not enjoy his dignity long, for he died the next year. This began the great undertaking, which with no fmall difficulty was supported by a continued repetition of attempts, and in which our Kings oft took a share, tho' not in their own persons, till after a multitude of disappointments, the Princes of Europe faw that the project was not likely to succeed, and so in end withdrawing their forces, thought proper to leave the Mahometans in full possession of these countries to this As it does not feem to lie within the compass of my design, I shall not take upon me to give any positive opinion about the absolute lawfulness of such an undertaking. To an unprejudiced person, it must appear a little doubtful, what > title the Princes of the West had to dispute the Saracen conquests in the East, and to try, at the expence of such a vast essuance of christian blood, to wrest out of the hands of the present possessors a track LETTER of country which, the once blessed with the XV. precious privilege of being the boly land indeed, nad been now for more than four hundred years abandoned by the divine protection, and given up to these merciles invaders as lawful inheriance. But without entering farther into the meits of the cause on either side, this much I may ake the freedom to fay, that however pious or awful these croisades might have been in the niginal design of them, they were most irreguarly conducted in the execution, and turned out to most miserable account in the end. The Popes were the only gainers by them: For they never failed to make use of them for the worthy purpose of embarassing the German Emperors and other christian Princes, and of squeezing money into their own coffers, under pretence of raising supplies for these holy wars. If it shall be thought a laudable enterprize, which is the great, if not the only plea that can be advanced for them, to rescue the poor christians in these parts from the oppression of such savage barbarians, it were posfible perhaps to confute fuch a plea, by the counterbalance of the millions of christian lives (equal u number probably to all of that character in he holy land) that were lost in the struggle, and which, as matters turned out, were thrown away o no purpose. Upon the whole, we may now, rom the experience of fo many hundred years, und upon the faith of fo many authentic histories, pronounce of these romantic expeditions, that their lawfulness was questionable, the management of them foolish, and the event not only highly pernicious to the undertakers, but even in Ff2

XVI. undertaken. What is it that mistaken zeal and a forward temerity will not drive men to?

I am, &c.

LETTER XVI.

Accession of Alexander I.—His Resolution in the Affair of Eadmer, elect Bishop of St. Andrews—Account of the Controversy about the Investiture of Bishops.

his reign and was succeeded by his brother Alexander, who for the courageous and undaunted spirit, which he displayed on several occasions, was surnamed the Fierce.

In the first year of his reign, there came Monks of the Benedictine order from Tyron to Selkirk, where Radulphus, one of their number, was made their Abbot. This King likewise founded for the canon regulars of St. Augustin, as they were called, the Abbeys of Scoon and Inch-colm, with the priories of Lochtay and St. Andrews. He completed the buildings of Dunfermling, which his father had begun, and gave to the Bisho P.

t. Andrews a piece of ground called Curfus LETTER i, with many other rich benefactions. But most important transaction in his reign, that tly belongs to church-affairs, is the part he d, and the opposition he met with, about filthe fee of St. Andrews upon Turgot's death. : King had written, we are told, to Ralph 1 Archbishop of Canterbury, upon this event, ring his advice and affiftance in supplying the incy, and complaining of the Archbishop of k's intermeddling in the affairs of the Scottish rch. However, four years elapsed before any ig was done in the business: For Ralph was ged to go to Rome to support his own cause inst his competitor of York, where after much ngling he carried his point, and returned to gland in triumph. On his return, Alexander ewed his application, and defired that Eadmer Ionk of Canterbury, of whom he had heard good report, might be fent to him. To this, ph, tho' with much reluctance, consented, and atched Eadmer with commendatory letters to tland, who upon the third day after his comto St. Andrews, was, with the King's licence, fen by the clergy and laity to be their Bishop. the next day, in discoursing with the King ut his confecration, Eadmer magnified the preative of the see of Canterbury over all the rches of Britain to such a degree, and expreshis defire of receiving confectation from the ids of that Archbishop in such positive terms, highly offended the King, who was equally itive not to admit any fuch precedent. t in end, after much contention, Eadmer was fuaded by some friends who knew the King's exible temper, to give up his election and re-

XVI. ingly, and the election fell next without any c troversy on Robert the first Prior of the law erected abbey of Scoon.

erected abbey of Scoon. This is the substance of the whole affair, related by Archbishop Spotswood and Mr. Colli from Eadmer's own account of it, which we n fairly suppose, would be fully as favourable to pretensions of the see of Canterbury, which had fuch a pride in being a Monk of, as to t privileges of the Scottish church, where he.h been chosen to be a Bishop. For he tells us his felf that, when the King urged his having no cc nection with Canterbury now that he was ele Bishop of St. Andrews, he replied with sor heat, that "not for that bishoprick, nor for: "Scotland would he deny himself to be a Mor " of Canterbury." By his account indeed, t King is represented as having betrayed mu fickleness and inconstancy, which is not content with the character given him by other wr ers. For in his first letter to Ralph he is ma to fay, that "the Bishops of St. Andrews we " wont to be confecrated only by the Pope his

"felf, or by the Archbishop of Canterbury which yet Mr. Collier says is contrary to me ter of sact, "the churches of Scotland having been a long time under the metropolitical jur book iv.

Ch. Hift.

"diction of the fee of York." However feems to hold the letter as genuine, as our or historian Spotswood had done before him. B another English writer, Dr. Nicholson, is of a d scotchHist. ferent opinion: For having given us a copy

Lab. p. 357. it, he says "there are many expressions in the letter, which are justly liable to exception, as "have been thought by men of skill to savo strongly of the English cloyster: Nor shall I LETTER! pretend to vindicate it." And even Mr. Col- XVI. r himself, upon other occasions, produces seve: I of his own country-men suspecting the hoefty of the Monks of Canterbury in matters at concerned their own dignity, and even chargg them with falsifying papers for that purpose. ut allowing that Alexander had really written ich a letter, and in such terms, yet if his behaour be fairly examined, it may be justified up-1 the supposition that what he wrote had proeded from his not being then properly acquaintl with the independent constitution of this surch: And his refusal to admit Eadmer's beg confecrated by Canterbury might have been e refult of mature confultation with his other ishops, who knew better, and might fear the oublesome consequences of such a proposal. r. Collier indeed goes further in his narraon of this affair than Spotswood had done, and lls us, that after Eadmer had lived privately 'o years at Canterbury, he wrote to King Alexder; expressing his willingness to accept the arge on the King's own terms; but died, as r. Collier supposes, before it could be known hat effect this offer would have had. And here e find a strange kind of reason assigned for his us renewing his claim, "because he had been advised by some Bishops that election went far-

Sir David Dalrymple is of opinion, that Alexander's extission was flattering and artful. He meant to relieve his agdom from the pretension of the one Archbishop, without knowledging the authority of the other. He therefore left right of consecrating doubtful between the Pope and the weblishop of Canterbury, while at the same time he seemed to lace them both on a level. (Annals of Scotland, vol I. p. 52.)

LETTER " ther towards the character of a Prelate XVL " confecration;" as if the fimple voices of clergy were more operative to the Episcopal racter than the folemn and authoritative e of the Bishops. It might be asked, what of the Episcopal office the most regular eleccould warrant the exercise of, without or be confecration? Could the elect by the fingle tue of his election hold fynods, or enact can or confer orders? He might, perhaps be le ly entitled to receive rents, or exact tyther lease lands, which indeed at that time bega be too much reckoned the material parts of the historian calls the character of a Prelat But to act in the character of an Apostoli even a Cyprianic Bishop, certainly no man c pretend under any title whatever, till he had power conferred upon him by those who could confer it.

> As this struggle between Alexander and mer is the first instance of the kind to be with in our Scottish church, it leads us to notice of a dispute which was much agitate that time between the church and the state more particularly between the Popes and poral Princes, about the right, as it was ca of the investiture of Bishops. This ceren was performed by the King's delivering a and a crosier, or pastoral staff, out of his han the Bishop elect before consecration, thereb vesting him in the lands and temporalities bel ing to the bishoprick. And we are told that the present case, a compromise was made bet the King and Eadmer, by which Eadmer re ed the ring out of the King's hand, and tool 'crosser from off the altar; and that on hi fign ion he returned the ring into the King's LETTER , laid down the crosser on the altar, and XVI. parted. This was halving the business, and ounding matters for the fake of peace, by it of both parties. For now the contenad begun, whether the church or state posthis right of investiture. When the Wes-:hurch was first endowed with lands and ral baronies, which did not happen till the of the Roman empire in the West, and was in use in the Eastern church, where ergy to this day have no fuch endowments. more of these lands required, what appeared no more than reasonable, some declaration nage and allegiance for the lands thus given and made use of a ring and staff, as the rd fymbols of fuch declaration. This was long time readily complied with, and the h-men, even Popes themselves, made no e to receive fuch comfortable donations, on were then thought such easy conditions. But forty years before the period we are now d at, Pope Gregory VII. who, as many even e Popish writers acknowledge, affected to e spiritual Sovereign to the highest stretch spotism, thought proper to annull this pracand thereby, as he gave out, to abrogate the shadow of controul that the state might preto have over the church. This was a bold luction, and his fuccessors took care to folut the plan, by various methods and under is pretences, till, about the beginning of this inder's reign, Pope Paschal II. went so far pronounce a formal excommunication against lishop who should receive investiture from ly-powers, or should communicate with those Gg

LETTER who did: And tho', upon his being taken prifor XVI. er by the Emperor Henry V. who was a princ pal party in the quarrel, he yielded all that the Emperor defired, yet he was no fooner at liber ty than he folemnly revoked every concession he had made, with the common excuse, that it was extorted from him in duresse.

All this happened in the time of our first Alex ander, and was the cause of much contention and disorder for some years. On the Pope's side it was argued, That the church being a spiritual, was at independent society: That she had received he powers from Christ, so could not yield them up to the Prince: That it was facrilege in the state to demand any acknowledgements from the church and simony in the church to give any: That such encroachments destroyed the constitution of the church, and cancelled the divine original charter of her settlement: And to corroborate these arguments, Paschal produced the decrees, as he called them, of his predecessors, Victor, Zephyrinus and many more, in confirmation of the immunitie of Holy Church. These were specious arguments and feemed to carry a great deal of force wit But as the Abbe Fleury observes, in & veral parts of his history of these times, especiall in his discourses on church matters, (which eve Voltaire, in his Age of Louis XIV. fays, are th best that ever were written) all this was but cor founding things, and jumbling together the tw powers of the church, the spiritual and the ten poral, which ought still to be considered separate ly in every controversy of this kind. For on th fide of the temporal princes, it might be, and wa pled, That they did not design to meddle with, o encroach upon, any inherent radical powers of th church church: That their becoming members of the LETTER church, if it did not increase, certainly did not XVI. diminish, what rights otherwise belonged to them se fovereigns within their respective dominions: That they and their predecessors, in their willingness to protect and encourage the church, never intended either to invade her privileges, or throw away their own prerogatives: That these lands, and the regalities annexed to them, being parcels of their feveral crowns, they had a right to require and expect fuch acknowledgements for the gift of them, as might tend to their own fecurity, and were not denied by other holders: That if it was wrong in the state to require such acknowledgements, it was equally wrong in the church to have accepted upon these conditions, as she had no more to do but refuse the gift, if the conditions did not please her: That therefore, if it should be called facrilege in Princes to keep hold of the and and lordships once given to the church, and eccepted by her upon fuch and fuch conditions, what could it be called in the church to pretend to possess the gift, and now to quarrel at and depart from the conditions on which she had acceptit? In a word that it was not Bishops, but Baons they were contending with: So that if the hurch found any inconvenience from the union of these two characters, she had no more ado but throw up the donations on which it was counded, and revert to her original and indisputed independence.

Thus was the question bandied backward and orward between the two rival powers, and it is no difficult matter to see on what side the right lies, or rather that both sides were partly in the right, and partly in the wrong. The lay-side G g 2 claimed

LETTER claimed too much, and the church would yiel XVI. nothing. She maintained, that the gifts bestower upon her by the piety of former times were unconditional, so could not be retracted upon an alledged failure or refusal whatever: Which pleas. though plaufible enough in appearance, and infifted on in this controversy, even by writers who otherwise profess no favour for the papal pretensions, yet upon the main does not seem to be altogether well founded. It is certain that the practice of thus giving away parcels of land; with honours and powers annexed, being a part of, and flowing from the feudal system, which after the irruption of the Goths into the feveral parts of the Roman empire had prevailed over all the West, always implied some general return of homage and service, whether the particular species of fuch fervice was positively expressed or not: So that the' the Bishop, as such, and abitractedly from any adventitious confiderations might justly claim the independence of the Epi 1copal character on any civil power whatever, yet upon his being invested with, and accepting of the additional titles and honours of Baron, he thereby became liable to the fovereign lord of the barony's in the common burdens and services incident to fuch tenures. For it is scarcely supposable that the Gothic Princes, who were the first donor of fuch gifts, would have given off fuch large portions of their dominions, which had cost there fo long time and fo much trouble to acquire without some acknowledgment, if not of subjection, at least of dependence and sidelity. New ther do we read that the Bishops or churchemen who first received these new gifts, ever refused, or shewed any reluctance to the requisite LETTER acknowledgments. XVI.

fulc

On the other hand, what seemed to have been ~ most faulty on the side of the temporal power, was the delivery of the ring and crosser, which, from the ring's being the symbol of marriage, and the crosier, by resembling a shepherd's crook, an emblem of pastoral care, and these too to be received before confecration, might be thought to convey fomething of a facred character, and give countenance to a dangerous mistake, as if one could not be a Bishop till the King had married him to his charge, and committed the feeding of the flock of Christ to him. For which reason, this particular ceremony, as carrying fuch an unfavourable aspect to the spiritual powers of the church, was at last, after much wrangling, departed from by the Emperor and other lay-sovereigns. But they still infifted on homage and allegiance for the lands and temporalities held of them, which the Popes and church-men sometimes yielded and fometimes objected to, according as they saw the Princes refractory or tractable in the dispute.— At last, after a variety of what were called pragmatic fanctions and concordates, which one Pope would confirm, and his next fuccessor perhaps revoke, the whole affair by degrees, and infenfibly as it were, fell into that condition in which matters have been carried on, with a shew of outward com-Pliance, often mingled with fecret discontent, between the church and state these many years. All which is owing to the liberality of those devout ages, when it was thought, too much could not be done to aggrandize the church, and to Trake the fituation of her clergy not only easy and comfortable, but even honourable and splendid. Yet, however pious and laudable the design

LETTER might have been, the effect it had for a los time was to strengthen the hands of the Roma Pontiffs, and to add to that wealth and power which they had been, thro' fo many centurie striving to accumulate, and which this los struggle about investitures gave them such a plan fible handle to fecure. For by all their ende yours to bring the clergy from beneath the ten poral yoke, as they called it, their great aim wa to draw them the more completely under the own; fo that what the state lost, either by con cession or thro' necessity, in the contest, was a gain to the church in general, or to the sever Bishops in the several parts of it, but was all swa lowed up in the particular church of Rome, (funk in the Pope's private exchequer. Yet sti the Church, as every denomination and division call themselves, when they are once established b law, is complaining of the evil, and pushing b all possible means for a cure; while the radic cause of the evil is greedily retained, and the fettlements made upon her by the state sticke for, and kept hold of with as much zeal and a gerness as used to be shown in old times for the essentials of faith, or purity of worship. Our ow age and country afford a proof of this, in more fpects than one; only with this difference amor us, that what the Pope in the days of his royal grasped so eagerly at, the people now put in the claim for, and are as clamorous as ever he was, f the precious right of nominating those who are enjoy the legal stipends.

But we need not dwell longer on the contiverty at this time: We shall see the various nethods of handling it, and the various consequent of it, as we go along. The part which K. Ale ler acted in the affair of Eadmer the Monk of LETTER nterbury, besides its connection with the sub-iXVI. of investitures, has a relation likewise to anor important and much contended article, the jection of our church to an English metropoli. But as this will come before us again, at a sequent period, and in a more agitated manifelated, I shall refer till then, what may be said upon and conclude this letter, with observing, that or having reigned happily and commendably enteen years, Alexander I. died without issue, the year 1124, and was succeeded by his broom David.

I am, &c.

LETTER

XVII.

L E T T E R XVII.

Bounty of K. David to the Church—His Choracter vindicated—Decretals of Popes compiled by Gratian—Two National Councils held, one at Roxburgh, the other at Carlifle—Accession and short Reign of Malcolm IV.—Account of Peter Lombard, &c.—And of the School-Divinity.

AVID, when Prince of Cumberland, in the time of his brother Alexander, had been a great benefactor to the church, particularly to the lately re-erected See of Glasgow, by making inquisition into, and restoring the lands, which had belonged to it, but by some means or other, had been wrested from it. When he came to the throne, as his power was enlarged, so his benefactions increased in proportion. He founded the monasteries of Jedburgh, Kelso, Melross, Newbottle, Holyroodhouse, Kinloss, Cambuskenneth, Dundrenan, and Holmcultran in Cumberlands He endowed two monasteries at Newcastle, and two numeries for women, one at Berwick, and her at Carlisle. To the six Bishopricks al-LETTER y in Scotland, he added other four, Ross, ien, Dumblane, and Dunkeld. So fay all historians, one after another. And yet it d appear, by what Mr Goodall has produced prefatory differtation, that these two last had ancienter than K. David's time: For he has with a Cormac, Bishop of Dunkeld, attesttwo charters of K. Alexander's, and confetly prior to David: And as to Dumblane. s made it appear, from the mention of a vain it for a hundred years, that fuch a vacanust have been before K. David, because from me, the fuccession of its Bishops is clear and From which Mr Goodall concludes. Dumblane, as well as Dunkeld, had been a p's Seat in very ancient times, tho' K. David, put them on a regular footing, according to ite plan of temporal endowment, has, on that int, not altogether improperly, got the glory ving first erected them. Be in this what will, univerfally agreed, that he removed the p's Seat from Mortlich, where Malcolm II. ixed it more than a hundred and twenty years e, to Old Aberdeen, and bestowed upon it lands about that town, and in Clate, Tilly-Rain, Daviot, and elsewhere, by which, Spotswood, that See was greatly enriched. first Bishop after this removal was Nectanus, om K. David's charter was granted. out this time there happened a strange comon in England, on account of a disputed sucn to the crown, which gave our good King uneafiness, and necessarily entangled him in r, contrary to the peaceable bent of his truly The case was this: Henry tian disposition. II h

LETTER I. of England had married the Princess Maud. XVII. David's sister, by whom, at his death, he only one daughter Maud, who was first mar to the Emperor Henry V. and next to the Ear Anjou in France, to whom she bore a son cal after his grandfather, Henry. The old Her on his death-bed, made the clergy and nobilit England take an oath of allegiance to his day ter and her issue, as the true heirs of the cro defigning thereby to fecure the peace of the ki dom, by fettling the fuccession. Yet no soo was Henry dead, than Stephen, his sister's s fet up an opposite claim, and landing in Engla got a part of the nobility, and the most of clergy, to veer about from their former oaths,? declare for him. The Pope too thought pro to fanctify this usurpation by his authority, a by a formal Bull took Stephen under his prot tion. Yet this appearance of the Pope on the f of injustice, did not hinder our King from int esting himself in the quarrel, both to support niece's title, and to fulfil the engagements which on account of the large possessions he held in Es land, he had entered into with her father in l favour. During the whole time that the usur tion was kept up, he stood firm to the rig cause, and more than once appeared personally arms, with various success indeed, against Steph and his party, till by his powerful and perfeveri interpolition, the compromise was brought about by which his grand-nephew Henry peaceably cended the throne upon Stephen's death.

How ungratefully this Henry requited all the by his behaviour to David's posterity, I need to spend time in observing. Neither does it ly must in my way to pass any sentence upon the unclaracteric istic conduct of the English clergy, with the LETTER at their head, on this occasion. I shall leave XVII. these topics to their own historians, who, all their partiality, are at a loss for arguments ify what I have mentioned. Only it is manithat a noble and generous part our King acted s time to the injured side. And it is the more kable, that he might have acted otherwise. better right than can be commonly alledged h cases. His own title to the disputed crown referable to that of either of the competitors, on his uncle Edgar Atheling's death, he was le male-heir of the Saxon kings. And tho' English historians give out that Henry the s marriage with Maud reconciled the English m, by thus uniting their old Saxon royal with that of the late Norman invaders, yet could not but know that Maud's brothers, heir issue, had all of them a prior right to and her issue, upon the footing of hereditary For what reason our Kings made no is not easy now to say. olm Canmore, the first of them, who in virf his Queen Margaret had any pretensions to , was precluded from pushing her right durie life of her brother Edgar, who being a of no ambition, submitted to the Norman es, and lived privately in England to a good ge without any disturbance. Consequently, er Malcolm, nor his two fons Edgar and inder, had any room to claim, tho' they had both able and willing, as long as the nearir was filent: And when David succeeded, his uncle was then dead, yet finding his fifharing the English throne, and having issue l it after her death, he might yield his own Hh 2

LETTER right to fuch a near relation, and be fatisfied XVII. fee the Saxon race once more swaying the scepe of their ancestors. For the the Duke of Nor mandy pretended a title to the English crown, by the testamentary gift of Edward the confessor, yet that deed, tho' genuine, which is much queftioned, could give no fair title, as that Edward was only younger brother to Edgar Atheling's grand-father, and fo had not the right in his own person. Neither can it be said, that the Pope's Bull to William, authorifing him to take and keep possession of the English throne, could have been the influencing motive with our David, however good a friend to the Pope otherwife, as we find him paying no regard to a like Bull at this time in Stephen's favour. Which fliews by the bye, that our Kings then, tho' respectful enough to the Pope, when he kept within proper bounds, yet took the liberty to oppose him, when they found him patronizing what they thought injustice. At that time too, when nations for the most part were of a warlike dispofition, and the modes of hereditary fuccession not fo nicely and regularly ascertained as afterwards, the longest sword might be thought to give a sufficient title, especially when it met with no opposition from a better one. Accordingly we are told, that the Duke of Normandy rested his plea mostly upon this bottom, and he is commonly known in the list of the English Kings, by the distinguishing appellation of William the Conqueror.

I have faid so much upon this difficult subject, not with a view to determine on which side the right lay, which is both foreign to my purpose, and per haps above my capacity, but to do justice to ou good King's character, which is much misrepresentation.

ient

lented by the English historians on this occasion. LETTER Thus Mr. Collier, notwithstanding of his seem. XVII. ing to condemn Stephen's intrusion, by his arguing every where against it, yet artfully disguises the true reasons of our King's motions, and only fays, "many of the nobility in the "Southern parts now appearing against Stephen, "and giving him a diversion, David King of "Scots takes hold of the opportunity, and in-" vades England with a numerous army." Hist. b. iv. Might it not have been expected from Mr. Col- P. 329. lier, that he would have mentioned the defence of the Empress's title, which himself acknowledges to be the just one, as the onerous cause that led David to this expedition, and not have put it, as his way of telling it would imply, upon the cowardly motive of feizing the favourable opportunity of the usurper's being otherwise distreffed? Even Camden too, another English writer, who pretends to a great deal of candour and impartiality, throws a mean reflection on King David's memory, in his Britannia, where describng Northallerton in Yorkshire, he savs, "near " this place was the battle, commonly called of " the Standard, fought, in which David King of "Scots, who with unheard of cruelty had made * these countries almost a defart, was put to flight, with such a slaughter of his men, that " our people concluded justice had now got her "full revenge." This is very inconsistent with the amiable character and humane disposition of that Prince, who, with much more appearance of truth, is faid to have grievously lamented these unavoidable, and on both fides cuitomary devaftations, which the just war he was engaged in gave LETTER gave occasion to, and which it was not in XVII. power entirely to prevent.

A worthy man in every respect he certain was. Mr. Collier owns "he was a Prince " a great many good qualities, and endeavo " ed to promote the interests of religion." A Buchanan, no great flatterer of Kings, fays him, that "the most ingenious orators, in end " vouring to give a description of a perfect Kir " could not in their minds form such a mo " as David approved himself to be, in every p " of his life." We read of no contentions l tween him and the Popes, or other church-me about elections or promotions of clergy. Eith his extraordinary piety had inclined him to yie any contendible point, and rather depart from l own right than disturb the peace of his mind feeking to defend it: Or the Popes and the partizans might be so struck with his unequall munificence to the church, that they could n find in their hearts to have any disputes with su a patron, or wish to create him any uneasiness. Indeed this his extraordinary liberality has be variously thought and spoken of. The reslection of King James I. upon it is well known, th

"he was a fair faint for the crown," or as John Hist. b. iii. Major tells it, that on looking at his grave flould fay, "Lie there, thou most pious of King but one who has been detrimental to the King

"and kingdom of Scotland," meaning that fpent too much of the royal revenues in building for many and so magnificent edifices: "Of white opinion, says Major, I myself am, for he me tissed upwards of sixty thousand crowns up

" these abbacies, and he could not at first ha
" reared the fabrics without a much larger sur
" Y

t in these works the King did not do amis, LETTER t acted very piously: For to a morally good XVII. rk it is not required that it should be regued by prudence: It is enough that it prod from ignorance, or even from an unwilerror, &c." This may appear but a lame f vindication, tho' very much in the scholasanner of its author. Archbishop Spotswood s a better defence, by having recourse to the dy excuse of a good intention, with no finifdefigns at first, and not responsible for conuences." But whatever may be faid for the goodness of such benefactions, it is not easy w how it was possible that these pious Kings have so many lands to bestow upon bishopand abbeys, if it be true, which all our hifagree in, that Malcolm II. had given away s lands among the nobility so long before: s we shall suppose, with Buchanan, in his nt of this Malcolm, that they recovered them by condemnations and forfeitures. But it : very likely, that fuch worthy men, as all itermediate Kings were, would have gone on ch an iniquitous and unpopular practice, or o many families would have parted with large possessions, without more noise and bance than our histories have taken notice There feems therefore to be fomething here, cannot be easily unravelled at this difof time, for want of proper and authentic is, as there are few of the charters of our families which go so high up as these times. ly we are fure of the fact in one part, that nurch was richly endowed by repeated ins of royal bounty, whatever fource that ty had to flow from: And as this King Da-

LETTER vid furpassed all his predecessors, both in the num-XVII. ber and extent of his donations, so, it might be thought, he had left little to his fuccessors to do of the like kind, either because the church was now abundantly provided for, or the royal reve nue much exhausted. Yet it does not appear to have been altogether drained: For we shall find his fuccessors now and then following his example; and it is one of the arguments used in his vindication, that, much as he gave away, he did not so far impoverish the crown, but that his posterity had funds in their hands wherewith to shew their good-will to the church, in the fame way, if not to the fame degree, as he had done.

> It was in this King's time that the Monk Gratian, a Tuscan by birth, compiled that great work of the Decretum, or decretals of Popes, which the church of Rome has made fo much use of ever fince, and is the principal foundation of what they call the Canon law. Something of this kind had been attempted before by an Isidorus Mercator, who published a collection of canons and decrees of Popes from Clement down to Sylvester, which collection, tho' full of blunders and manifest tokens of forgery, imposed upon the whole Latin church, and for eight hundred years, even down to the last century, past on the world as genuine. But now, fays Fleury, there is no person ever so slenderly acquainted with church-matters but knows them to be counterfeit. The two learned Cardinals, Baronius and Bellarmine, tho' they fain would have made ule of them, saw so many insuperable objections 2gainst them, that they were obliged to give them up, and confess the imposture. Yet Gratian's COIL

Impilation, which is still in esteem with the Ro-LETTER anists, has a great resemblance to this farrago XVII.

Mercator's; and the commentaries upon his ork, commonly called Glossa Decreti, are much the same stamp, notwithstanding of the great ress laid upon them. Such have been the pillars hich so long supported the stupendous fabric papal power, which, experience has shewn, soon regan to totter, when these pillars were shaken, and it is a shame in the church of Rome to keep a chain of pretensions, which had nothing at such palpable, and now discarded forgeries countenance and enforce them.

In this reign too were held two national counls in the dominions of the Scottish King. One A.D. 1226. Roxburgh by the Cardinal Priest John of Crea, the Pope's Legate, of whom the English hisvians tell, that, after he had one day inveighed ith great bitterness in a splendid oration against e married clergy, he was next night catched in ed with a strumpet, and obliged to scamper off ith disgrace. Baronius is at great pains to disrove this ill-looking story, but after all is so todest as to own, that his defence falls short of justification, and that it is possible the Pope's prefentatives may fail in their morals like other cople. Which we own to be a pertinent enough ofwer; and our writers would not take so much otice of this affair, if the Romanists were not lways boasting of the continence and purity of beir clergy, which this instance, in such a man and at fuch a time, may put them in mind is not always fo strict as they would make us believe.

The other council was held by the Legate Albericus Bishop of Ostia at Carlisle, where in those A.D. 1133. days King David ordinarily kept his court. But

what

XVII. not told: And indeed the great design of i meetings, and under such presidents, seems to I been not so much to preserve the faith, or rest the manners of christians, as to display the ry of the papal see, or decide any difference mong the Bishops or Abbots about power or cedence. It was this King too, who for the period of the church, proposed an union between Canons of St. Andrews and the Culdees of Le levin, which neither of the parties were plea with, and notwithstanding of the King's lauda intentions, turned out to nothing at that it but paved the way for the utter extinction of Culdees in the end.

At last, after a reign of twenty nine years, great and good King David died in the v 1153, and was succeeded by his grandson M colm IV. and last of his name, a youth of o twelve or thirteen years of age. His being young exposed him to the insults of his cor Henry II. of England, who forgetting the fervi done to his mother and himself by Malcoli grandfather David, and in evasion of the oath t he had fworn when he received the honour Knighthood from his hands, never to disturb posterity, yet harassed this young Prince with p petual vexations, and at last wrested Northu berland out of his hands, leaving him only Cu berland and Huntingdon. This Malcolm, co monly called the Maiden, founded a monastery Ciftercian Monks at Cupar in Angus, and gave Matthew Kininmont, the Bishop of Aberdeen, w built the cathedral church in memory of St. M char, the lands of Tulligrig, Fetterneir, Crud Banchory-Devenick, and Belhelvie, with the tronage of the churches. He died unmarried in LETTER the twenty fifth year of his age, and twelfth of XVII. his reign. Boece has given us a long and learned freech made to him by Ernold Bishop of St. Andrews, persuading him to marry. And Archbishop Spotswood tells us, that Edward Bishop of Aberdeen was at as much pains to dissuade him from it, which, he says, procured Edward the hatred of many.

In this King's time flourished Peter Lombard, Bishop of Paris, who compiled the Book of Sentences, as it is called, which from that time began, and still continues to be taught in all the Popish schools of divinity. Hence he is called The Master of the Sentences, and his work has been the great text of all the various and contending tribes of schoolmen ever since. This introduced a new form of theology into the church, which, with the aid of the canon law, a production of much the same date, has done signal service indeed to the Romish cause, but has rather been prejudicial than useful to the real interests of religion. In the first ages of the gospel, the chriflian doctrines were delivered in a clear and perspicuous manner, and no subtilities of logic were wed but in disputations with the pagan philosophers, or with the more cunning and dangerous of the heretics. The Catechumens were taught a hort confession of faith, which contained the principal articles of religion, and was explained to them in easy discouries adapted to their understandings. The fermons or homilies usually delivered to the people, were designed to explain some portion of scripture, or enforce some moral doctrine. But this plain and simple method of instruction fell by degrees into neglect, and a 1 i 2 more

XVII. in the room of it, as appears from the pretent works of Dionysius the Areopagite, which we forged in the fifth or fixth century.

About the middle of the eighth century, lo Damascene was the first writer among the Gree who moulded divinity into a fort of fystem, a divided its particular doctrines into proper head in his four books Of the Orthodox Faith. In t Latin church we find no writer attempting the design before Lanfranc, who was Archbishop Canterbury in the time of William the Conquer and is faid to have composed a body of divini which is not now extant. Some time after h appeared in France Peter Abelard, one of t ablest and most acute scholars of his age, w published an introduction to divinity in the books, which, notwithstanding of the man's culiarities, and the perfecution raised against h by fome leading men in the church, both on count of his tenets, and for his attachment his beloved Eloisa, yet was of great use to Pe Lombard, who foon after, and on the fame pl composed his book of fentences from the w ings of the fathers, especially of St. Augustin, w has ever fince been reckoned the great Doctor the Latin church. And now the study of vinity affumed an entirely new form, and branched out into an infinite number of questic which were debated with all the warmth : fubtilty imaginable. Lombard was followed a variety of authors, all pretending to work a his model, fuch as Alexander Hales, Thor Aquinas, Bonaventure, Albertus, and many thers, who are all distinguished in the Ror church by the title of Doctor, with fome part raddition, as Doctor Angelicus, Doctor Subtilis, LETTER botor Fundatissimus, &c. And these were afterards divided into different parties and sectis, in-Nominals and Realists, Thomists and Scotists, ntentiarians and Quodlibetarians, who, under all ir pretexts of unity and following the same ster, were in direct opposition to, and had viot contests with one another.

Thus the pure doctrines of primitive christiay were laid aside, and nothing studied but ool divinity: For the improvement of which Aristotelian philosophy was called in to lend aid, and that too not learned from the Greek ginals, which Europe did not see for many urs after this time, but collected out of wretch-

Arabian books, and even from translations them, ill performed, and worse understood. t with all these defects, this jumble of philosoy was incorporated into the theology of those ies, and Aristotle held the chair of St. Paul many ages. By this heterogeneous mixture, ristianity was miserably vitiated, and every new empt brought in a new corruption. The oriial method adopted by Lombard, of extractz passages from the fathers on every partilar head, was now departed from, and instead it, recourse was had to philosophical principles d metaphysical distinctions, which could be so isted as to prove or perplex any subject. mmentators indeed gave out Lombard for their ct, and pretended to follow and explain the 'aster of the Sentences: But they soon forsook eir guide, and wandered far and wide into the elds of metaphysics. Aristotle was the grand acle for determining most of the intricate quesons in divinity: Or if at any time they were pleased

LETTER pleased to consult the writings of the fath XVII. was only as they found them in Lombard tian, or in the common gloss, which mad quotations often neither exact nor pertin Hence the scholastic style is so justly com of as dry and barbarous, and for the mc attended with disgusting obscurity. this the worst of it: This depravity and of taste gradually crept from the school pulpit, and affected their manner of prewhere preaching was thought necessary fermons now became full of divisions. tions, and low comparisons. It was rare any necessary point of faith or morality us in its proper extent, or established upo principles, and urged with eloquence and And even their devotional tracts were most part composed in so mystical a sty they are quite unintelligible and useless.

Thus matters went on from bad to work schools, every succeeding Doctor refining and adding to the blunders of his prede but all agreeing, or pretending to agree, i ing Aristotle their facred and infallible sta And that too, to fuch a wild degree of tion, that some of their writers have not s to fay, that "without Aristotle the church " have wanted many articles of faith, that Aristotle was as much the fore-ru " Jesus Christ in natural things, as John th "tist was in spirituals." It would not lieved what fulfome panegyrics the sch have lavished upon Aristotle, and what a stress they have always laid upon his log metaphyfics, which others have reckon worst and weakest parts of his philosophy, and not been at pains to publish their opinions LETTER o the world, and boldly to upbraid the first re- XVII. ormers with their contempt and rejection of him. it is true, there have been some few in the Ronish church who have ventured to speak otherrife of the Aristotelian philosophy, and even to despife the scholastic divinity founded upon it.— But the great bulk of their writers, both for numer and figure, have always been upon the schoolmen's fide, and consequently the supporters of Aristotle's philosophy, as appears, among a multitude of instances, from a remonstrance of the Sorbonne as far down as the year 1639, in which it is roundly afferted, that "it is impossible to " renounce the principles of Aristotle's philoso-" phy, without giving up those of the school-di-"Vinity as received in the church." Such has always been and still is the reputation of this method of studying divinity, which began at this time upon Peter Lombard's essay, and gradually role thro' many deviations from his original delign, to the enormous height in which it stood at the reformation.*

I am, &c.

LETTER

Whoever would wish to see more of this subject, may conish our Dr. Cave's Historia Literaria, and the French Dupin's Bilistheque, where it will be found fully and candidly discussed, with a number of useful and impartial restections upon it.

L E T T E R XVIII.

Accession of William the Lion, and State of the Churin his Reign—Claim of Metropolitical Aurity over the Scottish Church by the Archbishop York, considered—Distressing Consequences that Claim—William founds the Abbey of Abbrothock to the Memory of Thomas Becket—Remarks on his Character and Canonization—Account of Bishop Scott of Dunkeld, with Restions—Effects of papal Ambition—Fo

A.D. 1165. ALCOLM IV. was succeeded by his need brother William, who, for some reason other has been dignified with the surname of talion. His long reign, of near fifty years, is for matter, with respect both to church and stall and therefore deserves particular consideration. The first thing he took in hand was to reconnect the first thing he took in hand was to reconnect the mally demanding it in a peacable manner, as when that would not do, by force of arms. It in this he was unlucky: For riding out C.

day too carelessly from his army, he fell in a- LETTER mong fome troopers of the enemy, who took him in the ninth year of his reign, and carried him prisoner to the King of England, who was then in Normandy. This was a heavy misfortune: For, to regain his liberty, William was obliged to give fifteen hostages, and to deliver up four of his principal castles to the English. And not content with this, Henry called him up to York with his Bishops and Nobles, where he required him to take an oath of allegiance, and to promife to hold his kingdom of him as his superior Lord. English historians make much of this forced concession, as that on which their subsequent Sovereigns built all their ridiculous claims of superiority over our kingdom. Our own writers on the other hand cry out, and justly too, against this part of Henry's conduct, as one of the most ungenerous, and, all things considered, most ungrateful extortions that ever disgraced a crowned head. But this affair has been fully cleared up by the publication of Rymer's Fadera: And the formal renunciations voluntarily made, first by Richard I. and afterwards by Edward III. of England, are sufficient to set aside any hadow of subjection, which either the rapacious injustice of Henry, or the accidental captivity of William, could have brought Scotland into. it was not our state only that was humbled at this time: Our church too was involved in the calamity. For the Archbishop of York took hold of this opportunity to wreath his yoke of metropolitical authority upon the necks of our Bishops and clergy, in imitation of what he had feen his King doing to our King and nobility. this claim was fo formally canvailed, and in some measure finally determined in this reign, for K k

Bed. lib.i.

cap. 27.

LETTER which reason I have deferred speaking of it XVIII. now, I shall at once go back to the origina it, and bring into one connected view all that necessary to be said about it.

When Pope Gregory fent his missionaries

England, he proposed that, in the event church-settlement, there should be two Metre litans or Archbishops, one at London, and other at York, which were then the two car cities of these parts: And tho' out of personal gard to Augustin, he gave him jurisdiction c all the Bishops of Britain, yet, after his de the Southern Metropolitan, whether at London Canterbury, was to command all the South churches as far as the Humber and Trent, the Metropolitan of York, all to the North these rivers. This formal grant of the Sovere Pontiff has been the great fource of contenti and the English Primates themselves have not ways agreed about it. What right Gregory thus to model and plan out churches, may be led in question now, tho' it durst not have b meddled with some centuries ago. That the were Metropolitans in the primitive church, Bishops of the capital cities, to whom the ot Bishops of the province paid some degree of fpect, and applied for advice, tho' not to the fa pitch of precedence or subjection which came afterwards, but only for the fake of regula and order, has been abundantly demonstrated numbers of judicious antiquaries, and will not denied by any who allow a well-constituted E copacy to have been the primitive government But that these Metropolitans were nominated pleasure, and invested with prerogative by one fingle individual, whether Pope or Patriai will never be made out by any folid argument, LETTER or go down with any impartial inquirer. Their XVIII. ignity, whether much or little, seems to have een the effect of univerfal consent among all the lishops of the feveral provinces, that is, of the weral divisions of territory that were under the ivil jurisdiction of the capital cities; as it was refumable they would best know what was most onvenient for themselves and their several coneras. And tho' it should be said that Gregory lid nothing in this affair without the advice and oncurrence of a council of Bishops, yet what ould these Italian Bishops, in the neighbourmod of Rome, know about the situation of Briain? Or how could they judge what particular rgulations would be proper for the external poity of the church at fuch a distance?

I know this has been always a high-founding regument in the mouth of every assuming Pope, but he and his council had determined so and in. But what, or who were that council? A meeting of his vassals, who either would not, or lust not dispute his pleasure. And indeed upon heir own principles of supremacy and infallibility, such councils were altogether superstuous.—

absolute supremacy needs no concurrence, and neallibility seeks no advice. Yet in fact, after he Popes had begun to erect Metropolitical sees, and to grant palls or Archiepiscopal mantles, we ind their deeds frequently contended, and many of these new privileges reverting again to the old orm: * Which plainly shews, that the Popes

Kk2 had

^{*} Instances of this are currently to be met with in the church mals of these papal ages, even in England itself, where at the desire of King Offa, the see of Litchfield was raised to an Arch-

LETTER had no exclusive right to invest Metropolitans, XVIII. and that the church, even then, did not think herself obliged to submit always to such investi-

But, besides all this, it is still uncertain whether Pope Gregory's grant of jurisdiction over all the Bishops of Britain, was designed to extend over all the island in general, or only to include fuch Bishops as then were, or afterwards should be ordained, within that part of it which had been under the Roman dominion, exclusive of those among the Picts and Scots who had never bowed to the imperial yoke. For the Bede speaks of "omnes Britanniarum Episcopos," all the Bishops of Britains in the plural number, it is well known that the Roman conquests, which never reached, with any continuance of fettlement, over the Tweed, were denominated by this plural distinction of "Britannia superior et in-" ferior, or prima et fecunda," upper and lower, Camd. Br. or first and second Britain. So that Bede might properly enough express a Roman Pope's grant in the old Roman style, without meaning to stretch the powers of the Roman church, of which he was fufficiently fond, further than the powers of the Roman state had gone. Yet the modern English writers willingly forget this distinction, and when they read in any old historian, that fuch and fuch a King Athelitan, Alfred, > bishopric, and its bishop Aldulph honoured with the Pall by Pope Adrian I. about the end of the eighth century; and yet within a few years it fell back to its original state of subjection to Canterbury, and has continued so ever since.

> or Edgar, ruled over all Britain, they immediately boast of this as a proof of sovereignty over

Collier, ъ. ii. p. 136,144.

divif.

Scot

icotland too; not remembering that the oldest LETTER f their writers, Bede, Malmsbury, Monmouth, XVIII. c. for the most part call Britain that part here the Britons dwelt to the South of the alls, and speak of the Picts and Scots as beg out of Britain, and as it were beyond the a. Nor is this way of quibbling with the word Buch. hift. ritain confined to their accounts of the state; reg. 75. ey are at pains to bring it into their descriptions I the church also. Thus Camden says, "that York became a Metropolitan fee by her Bishop Paulinus getting the pall from Pope Honorius, and was to have the primacy over all the Bishops of Scotland, besides over twelve Bishops of England: But Scotland has for these five hundred years past broken off from her Metropolitan." And Mr. Collier in feveral parts of Britann. is history goes upon the same supposition.

Now let it be observed, that by Bede's account, 'ope Gregory's original plan was, that the Meopolitan of London (for it was there he defigned ne dignity) should consecrate and preside over velve fuffragans, and the Metropolitan of York ould have as many: So then, if according to amden, the Bishop of York was to have a priacy over all the Bishops of Scotland, besides twelve allowed him in England, he would ave had a larger compass of authority, and conquently have made a greater figure in the church an the other Metropolitan, which none of e Popes, who took the disposal of these matrs, ever fo much as intended. For the other ishops of Britain, besides the twenty four new ections, were affigned to the Primate of Canrbury, not to York, as Camden and others ould make us believe; and their own church

XVIII. Canterbury and York upon that score. But whatever Canterbury might pretend to, there is not the least vestige to be met with in all the letters of Gregory, Boniface, or Honorius, as related by Bede, of any thing to justify the Archbishop of York's pretentions. And indeed it was a long time e'er these pretensions were heard of. The three Scottish Bishops of Holy-island either knew nothing of them, or paid no regard to them.-During all the time of the separate state of our two monarchies, and for a long while after, they lay dormant. But no fooner had the piety of our Kings begun to fettle the church in their dominions upon what may be called a lucrative footing, than the Prelate of York thought it worth his while to look our way, and to fet up a claim which his fee had never been in possession of. The first public appearance of this nature, as I observed before, was in the time of our Alexander I. when Thurstan Archbishop of York claimed the privilege of consecrating Eadmer the elect of St. Andrews, and Eadmer himself refused consecration from any hands, but those of the Archbishop of Canterbury. However, the King's stiffness in rejecting Eadmer, prevented the business from being brought to a decision at this time. Mr. Collier tells us, that "this Thurstan" suspended John Bishop of Glasgow for resusant to make him a profession of canonical obedience.

"ence, in which refusal, John acted against right and ancient custom, as appears by unquestionable records. And yet the oldest record he mea-

Ch. Hist. book iv.

P. 316.

tions to prove this ancient custom, is a Bull of Pope Paichal II. about nine or ten years before, ordering the Scottish Bishops to receive Gerard of s their Metropolitan, and pay him all due LETTER And to strengthen all, he favs Pope XVIII.! s II. commanded John to submit to Thurthin thirty days, otherwise he threatened firm Thurstan's suspension against him.vn historians represent this affair in anoht, as owing to Thurstan's breaking off wly erected bishopric of Carlisle from the . of Glasgow, which provoked John to up his charge and go to Jerusalem, till the rdered him to return; which he did, and e twenty four years after. ther of Mr Collier's proofs is from a letter : Honorius II. to the King of Norway, in he is defired to receive Ralph, Bishop of kneys, who had been confecrated by the shop of York, and was subject to his juris-. But what connexion an affair of the King vay's could have with the concerns of the of Scotland, is not easy to discover, even g the story to be as genuine as Mr. Collier This Ralph, he had told us before, n fent by Paul, Earl of the Orcades, defiring onsecrated Bishop of these islands, and had, mformity to the custom of his predecessors," for confectation to the Archbishop of York, cordingly conferred it on him. Yet a good ifter, we find this Ralph, by commission hurstan, at the head of the English army pattle of The Standard, and making a long to them, in which he calls Scotland, "by an English province, and, in the character d Englishman, says, " I am ashamed that : people, whom we have always beaten in country, should be so hardy as attack us ur own." This needs to be reconciled B.iv.p.329.

ork

LETTER with his being fent from the Orcades, and sh XVIII. the impropriety of adducing a man, who could and talk after fuch a manner, as having any terest in, or relation to the church of Scotla Hence it has been concluded, and not with Keith's reason, that tho' the Archbishops of York Catalogue, been in use to confecrate Bishops with the title P. 130. Orkney, on purpose to swell out the dignity their See, yet these Bishops had been all but b titulars, without any authority over, or reside in these isles. But Mr Collier, notwithstand of his affection to Thurstan, for exercising metropolitical power over the Bishop of Glasge has a quarrel with him on another occasion, w at the instance of our King David, he consecra Robert, elect of St. Andrews, " without infift " upon the oath of canonical obedience fr Hist. b. iii. " him." This is his account of the mat p. 321. But our own church historian, Archbishop Spc wood, is more particular, and tells us, that bert stood elect two years, till Alexander's de in 1124, and then received benediction at hands of Thurstan, " with refervation of the " vileges of both churches," which confecrat he fays, would " not have been permitted " Alexander had lived: For he was a Prince " flood much upon his royalty, and would " endure at any hand, the least encroach Hin. b. ii. " upon either his kingdom or the church." P. 34. There is another English writer too, and he way prejudiced in our favour, the Bishop of Asaph, who is more modest on this head than Collier, and seems willing to compound this ch. i. p. 46. tendible claim: He insists, "that in ecclesias things, the Bishopricks of Glasgow and G way, which had been formerly erected by and being taken from them by the LETTER. , were now come into the hands of the XVIII. were both of them subject, without conon, to the Archbishop of York, as their olitan, for many ages: But he favs. either he or Canterbury demanded the edience from all the Bishops of Scotland. efused, as being an encroachment upon ient liberty of the Scottish Church." This onfession in so far, and coming from such It is true, he cannot part with his en's pretensions altogether: But then, eason he produces for these pretensions. ier to overthrow than establish them. : Saxon conquest of these countries from is, granting it to have been fo, dissolved exion with the British church, and unitto the Saxon church of York; then, by argument, the Scots getting possession of ich he cautiously expresses by "coming e hands of the Scots," loofed their deon their old Saxon masters, and joined the rest of the Scottish church, in comwith, if not in subjection to, the Bishop ndrews, who long before this, had been Maximus Scotorum Episcopus," the nop of the Scots.

atever be in this, so it was, that after had thus made the first attempt, matters state of what may be called disputable all King David's time. But under the gn of his grandion Malcolm, another made by Roger, then Archbishop of man of unbounded ambition, who, by a legatine commission from the Pope, i the Scottish clergy to a provincial A D. 1159.

L l council

LETTER council which he had called to meet at Norhan XVIII. To this council they fent their delegates, not a vielding to his claim, but out of regard to the A.D. 1159. authority of Legate which he bore. Here th Metropolitan supremacy was warmly debated or both sides, and in end the matter was appealed to Rome as the last resort of justice. tain their cause before the Pope, the Scottish de gy fent Ingelram Archdeacon of Glasgow, wh had been one of the delegates at Norham, an who managed the business so well, that after full hearing, Pope Alexander III. by a forms Bull declared the church of Scotland exemp from any jurisdiction but that of the Apostolic see And the Episcopal see of Glasgow falling void i the mean time, Ingelram was in his absence elect ed to it, and confecrated by the Pope's own hand at Sens in France, altho' Roger's agents mightily opposed it.

> This, it might have been thought, would have put an end to the contention, as the Pope's bul and personal interposition, according to the prin ciples of the parties concerned, ought to have been decisive. But as ambition is never fatisfied fo it values no authority, but what is in its own For in a few years, the heavy misfor tune of William's captivity, and the rigorou hardships put upon him by the King of England gave Roger, who was still alive, another chance of recovering what ground he had loft, an bringing the Scottish church into full subjection to his fee. The English historians tell us, the when William, according to the promise he ha made to Henry in Normandy, waited on him York, "to do homage for the kingdom of Sct is land after the custom of other homagers," a d putation putation from the clergy did at the fame time LETTER " consent and grant that the church of England XVIII. 's should have that superiority and jurisdiction over the church of Scotland, which in right ' she ought to have, and that they would never oppose her just privileges and pre-eminencies c To which agreement the rest of the Bishops and clergy were to give the fame fecurity." Collier, let the next year, in a meeting at Northampton, b. v. p. 383which William went, attended by most of the kihops and Abbots in Scotland, when Henry rewired these Prelates, in virtue of the oath of llegiance they had fworn to him, to make due knowledgement of subjection to the church of ingland, as had been customarily done in the tigns of his predecessors, they made answer that * they had never professed any subjection to the "church of England, neither were they obliged 'to make any fuch acknowledgement." here, fays Collier, the mifunderstanding between he English Archbishops themselves was of great evice to the Scottish Prelates. For Richard of Canterbury wishing to draw the Scottish church ato a dependence upon his fee, and failing in is defign, did what he could to disappoint Roger of York also, and with this view he prevailed with Henry to dismiss the Scottish Bishops without making the required fubmission.* This

The proceedings at Northampton clearly discover the forsay of the letter, said to have been written to Pope Alexander y William, and transmitted by the Pope to the Archbishop and hapter of York, in which William is made to acknowledge, hat the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of York did extend over codand, and to aver that he himself had sworn to support it. swoffen's Scots Hist. Lib. App. p. 138. At the same place will e found, a testimony in savour of Canterbury against York, sa-

LETTER is the English account: But our own writers re XVIII. late it with some difference of circumstances.— Boeth. lib. xiii. b. ii. p. 38. Crawford, Offic, of State, Leslie, lib. vi. in

They fay, the Scotch clergy were addressed by the Pope's Legate, who laboured hard to perfuade Spotswood, them to yield to the English church, and in particular to accept fuch a great and prudent Prelate as the Archbishop of York was, for their Metropolitan: And that, when all the Bishops for fear were filent, Dr. Gilbert Murray, a young reg. 93,&c. Canon of the diocese of Moray, did in a long and elaborate speech confute all the Legate's arguments, and protested, in the name of his church, that the might be left free to her original independence. Upon which the claimants defisted from their proposal, and Dr. Murray, in reward of his zeal, was upon his return made Bishop of Caithness, and afterwards chancellor of the kingdom. Bishop Leslie goes further in his character of Mr. Murray, and fays that, besides his brave appearance in defence of his church, he was a man of fingular piety, and famous for working miracles both alive and dead, on which account "fumma veneratione inter divos relatus, " a multis colebatur," he was fainted and devoutly worshipped by many.

From this time we hear little more of the English claim. The defences so oft produced of the Scottish side had exposed the fallacy of it, and the continued opposition made to it, had shewn how impossible it would be to establish it Convinced of this, Pope Clement III. iffued ano ther bull of exemption in favour of our church bricated in the fouthern mint. The Forgers of England, an the Forgers of all England were equally industrious; as Si David Dalrymple, alluding to the titles of the two Primates wittily observes, in his Annals of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 121.

which was confirmed, out of personal regard to LETTER King William, by the fucceeding Popes Celestine XVIII. and Innocent, expressly annulling the Archbishop of York's pretentions, and taking the Scottish hurch under the immediate protection of the oly fee. But whether this exchange was adantageous, or not, to our church, either in spiituals or temporals, is a question to which her ubsequent condition does not enable us to give distinct answer. Only it appears to have been nore for the Pope's advantage, both as to power nd wealth, than our subjection to York would have een. But our church herself gained nothing by the argain, being, as our vulgar proverb fays, "tak-'en out of the fire, and thrown among the em-'bers." For whereas, if the Archbishop of York and fucceeded in his claim, any contendible cause bout elections or fuch matters of litigation would a consequence of the metropolitical plan, have been in the first instance carried before him, which 10 doubt would have been inconvenient enough, now every thing of that kind was directly carried Rome, and the Popes took the decision of all nto their own hands, not as Popes only, or leads of the universal church, but as Metropoitans of the particular church of Scotland. onsequence was, that our Bishops were every now and then fummoned to Rome, either to have their lections confirmed, and their confecrations perormed by the Pope himself, or to answer any harge, however frivolous, that might be brought gainst them. This proved a greater inconvenience than what Dr. Murray had objected to the Archbishop of York's claim, which he supposed, and justly too, could not be fafely put in execution when there happened to be war between the

. 😴

XVIII. exposed to still greater risk in this way, as the world states thro' which the travellers were obligated pass, were almost constantly at war either with the Popes, or with one another. And according we read, that oft times our Bishops were detailed many years from home, upon these troubles fome and unnecessary errands, and frequent died either at Rome, or upon the road to or fro it.

In a word, our church by these means w on the whole in a most perplexed and une fituation. The Archbishop of York's deman was certainly, in any case, humiliating as we as unjust, and in some cases might have be highly detrimental. But the Pope's exemption however pleasing in the found at first, and carr ing a greater shew of honour and dignity, turn ed out in the end to be far more burdensom and added prodigiously to the hardships, which was speciously held forth to relieve. Had or church stood to the observation which Dr. Mu ray made in his speech at Northampton, "th "we had wife and learned Prelates among or " felves, capable to determine any controvers " and tho' they should be deficient, we had " good and religious King, who was able to ke " all things in frame and order, fo that we h " no necessity of anyistranger to be set over us had this observation, I say, been, under prop regulations, duly attended to, all had been wel and the church of Scotland could have been g verned within herfelf, on a plan more refembli The primitive model, and more conducive to b own interests, than any thing she ever experience from the Pope, or his pretended favours to h I have laid all this affair together, that we might LETTER. have a view of it at one glance; as it is a mataxVIII. Her of such general concern to the honour both of our church and nation, and may be of use, is we go along, to account for the several bruggles that from time to time were made to hrow off the arbitrary and galling yoke.

The next year after this council at Northamp- A.D. 1178. on, King William founded the fumptuous abbey of Aberbrothock in Angus, to the memory of Thomas Becket late Archbishop of Canterbury. whom the Pope had canonized some years before. This is one of the faints, and a great one too, in the Romish Kalendar, whose title to such a place cannot but be questioned by every one who is in the least acquainted with his history. He had been a great favourite with, and chancellor to Henry II. of England, who got him promoted to. the see of Canterbury, hoping for that reason to find him more quiet and peaceable than some of his predecessors in that see had been. But no boner was the man feated on the Archiepiscopal throne, than he began to contend with the ling about what he called the rights of the thurch, particularly about exempting the clergy from being tried in the King's courts for felony rany capital crime whatever, alledging that demadation was fufficient punishment to a clergyman for any offence. This and fuch like stretcha of privilege, in contempt of the King's royaly, obliged Henry to summon a convention of the ords spiritual and temporal at Clarendon, where y the constitutions then enacted, the encroachtents of the church upon the state were limited, nd the boundaries between the two powers in me measure ascertained. To these constitutions LETTER all the Bishops, and Becket at the head of them, XVIII. tho' with fome reluctance, agreed. But foon after, under a pretence of conscience, Becket retracted all his former concessions, and fearing a storm, got abroad to France, where he continued fix years, inflaming the Pope and the neighbouring Kings as much as he could against his own Sovereign and benefactor. At last Henry found it necessary, for the sake of peace and his own ease, to come to terms with him, and take him into favour again. On which he returned to England in triumph, where once more, by his rough behaviour to some of his brethren Bishops who had stood for the King, he raised such an odium against himself, that upon some passionate expressions which dropped from Henry, who was then in Normandy, four gentlemen of his houshold went over to Canterbury, and murdered Becket at Vespers before the altar, on the 29th of December in the year 1170.

Such was the tragical end of a man, who, as far as we know of him, had nothing to recommend him but pride and ambition, and an obstinate stiffness in defence of rights, which the church for a long time knew nothing of, and were no way effential either to her being or well-being I am far from approving the murder, or vindicat ing the murderers. It was certainly a damnable crime, and attended with most aggravating cir But the man's being murdere cumstances. makes him neither faint nor martyr. It was a article of faith, no point of doctrine, no spiritus right of the church, which he suffered for. A that needs be faid of his death is, that it was th deed of a rash combination of barbarous villain against a turbulent and domineering Prelat Suc

Such is the martyrdom of St. Thomas Becket, LETTER which makes so slaming a figure in the Roman XVIII.

Martyrology, and about which there are not a few surprising things to be observed.

What shall we think, for instance, of the bebariour of Pope Alexander, Becket's great friend and supporter, who, when he had these wretches n his hands, did not inflict the punishment on hem, which the law of God expressly required or fuch a wilful and facrilegious murder, but ent them, by way of penance, to Jerusalem, where they died in peace? What shall we think I the French King's coming in pilgrimage to Becket's tomb, and paying his devotions to the memory of a man, with whom he himself had In been offended for his pride and faucy behaviour, and who, he could not but know, had acted beyond either the character or duty of a christian Bishop? The conduct of Henry himself too, upin the occasion, is something unaccountable, and ven, if I durst say it, most unworthy. To see a King of his spirit and magnanimity in other maters, taking a folemn oath that he knew nothing If the murder, and yet submitting to be scourged for it by the Monks of Canterbury, which was a auch severer penance, every thing considered, han the Pope imposed on the actual murderers. referts a scene to us of so astonishing a mixture, hat one is at a loss whether most to reprobate the mcharacteristick meanness of the one party, or he abominable insolence of the other. And to ome nearer to the point which brought this piece f English history before us, our own King William's dedicating a religious edifice to this nan's memory, under favour be it spoken, ems to be no great honour to his own: And M m many

LETTER many, who are ready to admire his other valuab XVIII. accomplishments, will be furprized, if not grieved to find him taking fuch a public and facred notic of one, whose only merit was his haughtily en deavouring to throw down the crowns of kings at the foot of the papal throne.

But what, if after all, there should be more of state-policy than real devotion, in all the honour paid to Becket at this time by these three power ful Kings? Henry himself, for all his prowes, might be afraid of the Pope's refentment, which was more terrible in those days than we can well conceive now, and might think it prudent at least, if not necessary, to come down even to that mortifying degree of humility, in order to stop the torrent which he saw swelling against him. The King of France was jealous of Henry's greatness, which he had more than once felt the de fects of, and with a view to pique such a rival, might profess a greater veneration for Becket than otherwise he would have thought of. And the fame motive perhaps, joined to and heightened by the remembrance of Henry's ungenerous usage, might have induced our King to take this me thod of expressing his sense of it, as from the other parts of his character we can hardly suppose him really influenced by a hearty approbation of Becket's conduct. In a word, the lame excuse which Mr. Collier offers for Becket, "that the most exceptionable parts of his cha " racter may be faid to have been more the fault " of the age than of the man," may be applied to all the other three. Tho' still, it is but what I have called it, a lame excuse at best. For what is it that makes the faults of an age, but • the faults of the men who live in it, and how should a faulty age be reformed, if the men who live in it alway dways humour and follow the faults of it? The LETTER aultiness of the age therefore could be no found examples. XVIII. Use for Becket, in the character he was clothed with, of a messenger of the Prince of peace: And as the can any good excuse be made for the Kings those days going such unbecoming and pernious lengths to shew their regard for him; much are a faint of him, and teaches her members trust to his intercession, even to an amazing dece of presence above the true and only Interstor; if the vast superiority of devotional offerger at Becket's shrine for many years may be smitted in testimony of such presence.

mitted in testimony of such preference. Soon after this instance of extraordinary respect a man who had been so zealous for the Pope d the Church, against the King of England, our ing William had an interference with them both t his own account, and by his steadiness in his ra cause carried his point. The See of St. Anews falling void, the King recommended to the avent Hugh, one of his chaplains, to be chosen shop. But they taking another course elected. Archdeacon Scott. This the King opposed, earing by his usual oath, that Scott should not joy the place, and ordered the Canons to proed to a new election, which they did, and chose igh. Upon this Scott went to Rome, and got Pope to fend a Legate into Scotland, who nfirmed the first election, and made Matthew shop of Aberdeen to confecrate Scott on Triy Sunday in the year 1178. Yet the King still. od out, notwithstanding the Pope's admonitory ter; and to teltify his displeasure the more, confiscated the revenues of the see, and bahed Scott and all his adherents. The Pope Mm 2 hearing LETTER hearing of this, threatened to put the kingd XVIII. under an interdict. But Scott, who had go to Rome a fecond time for fafety, fell down the Pope's feet, and befought him not to proc to that rigour, faying, "that he had much "ther renounce his dignity, than that so ma " christian souls should for ought that concern " him be deprived of spiritual benefits." T foftened the Pope, and coming to the King's e fo reconciled him to Scott, that he offered l the then vacant bishoprick of Dunkeld, which good man with the Pope's leave accepted, a to the affair was peaceably adjusted. It is i that Hugh went to Rome to make up his per and receive confecration, but died on his retu ten years after his election; so long had contest been in agitation, and the first see in kingdom vacant all the time.

> Here we have a parallel to the affair of Be et in every particular, except the different be viour of the two Prelates who were princip concerned. We see a King as obstinate own way as Henry was, and no more obsequi to the Pope's determination than he had been We see a Pope as ready with his fulminati as Becket's Popes were, and every thing tend to fuch another fatal rupture. But in the fent instance we see a Bishop of our own, fible indeed of the manifest wrong done him, like a truly christian Prelate, studying peace n than dignity, and the good of fouls beyond private confideration. Had Becket behaved fuch a quiet and peaceable manner, we prob should not have heard of his Saintship: Or our countryman acted the part that Becket there might have been pilgrimages at his to and abbeys erected to his memory. Which of LETTER the two characters was most conformable to the Evangelical standard, can bear no dispute. And the comparison shews that, contrary to Mr. Collier's apology, the exceptionable parts of Becket's conduct were the faults of the man as much as of the age, since the age produced, and that too at no great distance of either time or place, a man of a quite different disposition, and who by his condescension had the happiness both to mollisy an enraged Pope, and pacify an obstinate King.

But this is not the only laudable part of this good Bishop's character: For after he had accepted the bishoprick of Dunkeld, which in all respects was far inferior to St. Andrews, when he found that the diocese was rather too large, and that the people in the mountainous parts of of it, spoke the Erse language only, he made proper application to have the diocese divided, and an Episcopal see erected in Argyle for the benefit of these parts, of which Evaldus, one of his chaplains, who spoke Erse, was made the first Bishop about the year 1200. It is said, that when he made his proposal to the Pope of dividing the diocese, and splitting the revenue, the Pope should by, "It is the study of others to enlarge their "bounds and livings, not caring how it goeth " with the people, but here is one who requesteth "that his benefice may be parted in two: O " how few Bishops are now in the christian world " fo disposed!" Would Archbishop Becket have done so? Or do we read of any of the Popes themselves that ever did so? Yet Becket is a saint, and our good humble Bishop of Dunkeld stands in the lift of his brethren without the least mark of distinction.

EFTER stinction. The reason is obvious: It was the Pope XVIII. who made saints in those days, and the English.

Primate had contributed more to exalt the Pope's grandeur than our Bishop did, which appears to have been the only cause that the one is so much dignified more than the other. I could not passe over the account we have of Bishop Scott of Dunkeld, without making these reflections upon it, to shew that the age, saulty as it was, had still some exemplary men in it, who knew their duty, and were a credit to their function.

In this King's reign the Popes got a new addition to their power, which lasted for some time, and laid a foundation for the extensive claim they continued to make fo long after. The croifade which had been preparing for several years in their way to the Holy land, turned their arms a gainst the Greek Emperor Alexius, and taking advantage of the divisions that happened in the Imperial family, they laid siege to Constantinople, and took it by storm on the twelfth of April in the year 1204, committing the most atrocious barbarities, as Nicetas a Greek historian, who suffered under them, testifies, and as the Romish writers themselves, with all their extenuations, are forced to acknowledge. Upon this unjust conquest, the Latins choic Baldwin Earl of Flanders for Emperor, and made one Morosini a Venetian, Patriarch under the Pope's obedience, which feems to have been the principal delign of the whole expedition. For wherever they extended their usurpation, they turned all the Greeks out of the churches, and filled them with Latin clergy, who readily came under the same yoke of jurisdiction to the Pope, which had so long prevailed in the West. And the Pope who then sat at the helm, Innocent smocent III. was one who well knew both how LETTER lay ichemes of this kind, and to improve every XVIII. dvantage for the aggrandizing of his fee, and eniching of his friends. But this jumble of diforder and confusion was of no very long duraion: For in less than fixty years, Michael Palæoogus, a brave Grecian, and related to the Imperial family, after many struggles with various suczess, at last totally expelled the Latin invaders, and mounting the throne himself, restored the old constitution both in church and state, tho miserably weakened and shattered by this desolating interruption, which, historians have observed, was almost the first thing that paved the way for the total destruction of that once flourishing empire by the Turks about two hundred years after. Such were the effects of Papal ambition, and fuch, among many others, were the confequences of these pretendedly facred expeditions. which were almost wholly under the Pope's direction, and evidently designed, as this very instance shews, to increase his power and influence.

But to return to our own country: During the reign of William we have an account of no less than four national councils held in it. The first at Edinburgh in the year 1177, by the Cardinal Priest and Legate Vivian or Winian, of whom the Scotichronicon says, "he came into Scot- land, trampling and crushing every thing, clever at taking and not slack at plundering, from whence he went to Ireland to hold a council there, and having finished his business, he returned to Scotland, and calling the Scottish Prelates together at Edinburgh, he held a council, in which many antient Canons were

LETTER " renewed, and new ones enacted:" But wh XVIII. these Canons were we are not told. The ne council was held at Perth in December 1201, 1 Lib. viii. the Cardinal Legate John de Salerno, and I cap. 25. three days, when there were many Canons mad of which we know only of these two, 1. "Th "they who had received orders upon Sunda " should be removed from the service of the: " tar. 2. That every Saturday from twelve o'cloc " of the day should be kept as holiday, by a " staining from work till Monday morning Boece, lib. ziii. What the reason of this first Canon could have been is not easy to discover, as certainly the s credness of the day provided for by the other C non could be no way impaired by performing fur folemn ministrations, as ordination is, upon it. In April 1206 we meet with a third council Perth, called in the original writ Synodus gener Crit. Essay, lis. The fourth council in this reign was at Per P. 589. too in 1212, and was held by William Malvoil Bishop of St. Andrews, Walter Bishop of Gk gow, and the other Bishops, without the presen of a Legate at the head of them. At this me ing the Pope's orders were published for preac ing up an expedition to the Holy land: Up which, fays my author, "great numbers of " ranks of clergy throughout Scotland, Regula " as well Seculars, took the cross, but very few "the rich or great men of the kingdom." Scotichrn. , 1.viii. c. 78. Two years after this council was held, King W liam died, in the seventy second year of his as and forty ninth of his reign.

I am, &c.

XIX.

LETTER XIX.

effion of Alexander II.—Council of Lateran eld at Rome, in which were three Scottish Biops—Canon made in Favour of Transubstanation—Historical Account of that Doctrine.

N the death of William, his fon Alexander II. A.D. 1214, a youth of only fixteen years of age, ascendne throne. In the second year of his reign, : Innocent III. issued a general summons to all relates of Christendom, to attend a general icil to be held by him at Rome, for the reforon of abuses, and recovery of the Holy Land. ordingly the council met in the year 1215, is called the General Council of Lateran, cong of 412 Bishops, among whom were three our church, viz. the Bishops of Glasgow, ay, and Caithness. But here the old form of ral councils was changed: For whereas, in meetings of old, where the Popc's Legates present, and as the Romanists pretend, als presided, every point was debated and caned in public, before any canon was formed upit, in this council, as the learned Du Pin affures drawn up by the Pope and his Courtiers before hand, were prefented by him to the Bishops and their filence, without entering, or being a lowed to enter, into any debate about them, we taken for approbation, altho' it is acknowledged that many of them were disliked by the Bishops and looked upon as very burdensome and hard to be born.

Affures us, a number of canons which had bee XIX.

Now as our church was represented in thi council, where, for the first time, some fort o fanction was given to one of the capital and di criminating articles of the present Romish faith the Doctrine of Transubstantiation, which is a best but a harsh doctrine, expressed by a hars word, it may be proper to take a fummary view of this part of the Popish Creed, from its fir appearance in the church of Rome, to the erac its establishment in this council. What the ol primitive faith on this head was, is evident to 21 one who has read the scriptures, and but glance at the primitive writings. The old heretics, wh so much infested the church in these first age were chiefly employed in combating the unity the divine nature, and the incarnation of Chris The eucharistic institution was not particular touched at by them. For the' their monfton errors in other things led them into some stram conceits about the way and manner of the exte nal administration, yet they never meddled wi the doctrinal part, or vented any peculiarities bout the nature or defign of the institution. So of them indeed, (of whom St. Ignatius speaks his epistle to the church of Smyrna) " abstain " from the Eucharist altogether, because they " not believe it to be the flesh of our Saviour

3 Christ:". And the reason they went upon, LETTER ding to their principles, was folid enough, XIX. ise that tribe of them did not believe that So that the martyr's words, t had flesh. the Romanists would fain wrest to their lense, say nothing for either side of the quesas these men who denied the existence of l's flesh, could not admit any thing relative either in reality or figure. e Greek Fathers in process of time began, in homilies and oratorical discourses, to speak rapturous style of this sublime mystery, and ke use of the strongest expressions, which the ulness of their language furnished them with, it off, and recommend it to the devotion of But in their argumentative disputa-, when they introduced it by way of comon, to illustrate other points, (for they never ted about it of fet purpose) we find them cautious and referved in their phraseology, out any of these high slights of hyperbole, h they had used in their popular exhortations. may be feen, among many other instances, heodoret's admired Dialogues with the Euans, who maintained the confusion of the two res in Christ, or as we might call it, a tranantiation of the humanity into the divinity, against whom that learned father argues from nature of the conversion in the Eucharist, h he makes a parallel to the other case. fame is observable in the famous letter of St. rsoftom to the Monk Cæsarius, against the llinarians, who had led the way to the Euians: Which letter was found in the Duke of any's library, by Emeric Bigot, a learned chman of the last century, who designed to N n 2

LETTER have published it entire, but because of a remark-XIX. able passage in it about the Eucharist, which is directly against transubstantiation, was obliged by orders of the Sorbonne, to suppress that passage, till Dr Wake, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, lighted on it, and fent it abroad into the world. From these and such like authorities, we may learn how this doctrine stood among the Greeks.

> In the Latin church the same observation will hold, as is clear from the elaborate works of Pope Gelasius about the end of the fifth century against the Eutychians, where he makes use of the same comparison, and argues in the same manner that the Greek Fathers had done in that controversy: Only with this general difference between the Greek and Latin writers, that in their pathetic discourses the Latins seem to be more cramped and confined in their expressions than the Greeks were, not because they had not fuch lofty conceptions of that mystery as the Greeks had, but because the defectiveness of their language did not afford fuch high phrases to convey their ideas in. But I needed not to have dwelt so long upon this point: For it is acknowledged by the Romanists themselves, by their two great Cardinals, for instance, Bellarmine and Perron, and by the two famous Jesuits Valencia and Vasquez, that for the first seven hundred years there was no dispute in the church about the Eucharist. The first alteration of style on this fubject in the Greek church, may be dated from the beginning of the controversy in it about images, towards the middle of the eighth century-About this affair a synod of three hundred and thirty eight Bishops from all the parts of the East

t at Constantinople in the year 754, where to LETTER nbat the then appearing superstition in favour XIX. artificial images, these Fathers call the Euchaic oblation "the true image of Christ," and confequence of this declare, that fincere chrins need feck no other. This was a home ument against the opposite party: And theree it was immediately attacked by the wellown John Damascene, Priest of the Monastery St. Sabas in Palestine, who in his great work the Orthodox Faith, peremptorily maintains that elements after confecration are "the very deified body of our Lord," and endeavours to wer all the objections which, he knew, would brought from the old Fathers, particularly m St. Basil's liturgy, against his affertion.

This was introducing the doctrine with some w of authority, as Damascene was a man of utation and character in these parts. Accordly in the year 787 when the second Nicene incil met to support the image-worship which I been condemned thirty three years before, y laid hold of this affertion of Damascene's i concluded, that the confecrated elements are not the image of Christ, but his very body and his very blood." It was their zeal for the age-worship (to establish which indeed was the in design of that assembly) that drove them inthis declaration, as they had no other way to ry the thrust aimed at it by the former counbut boldly to overthrow their doctrine by an Yet all the while, neither posite conclusion. mascene nor this Nicene meeting say any ag to establish the modern transubstantiation. not to dispute their quotations with them, to infift upon the many appearances of LETTER felf-contradiction which they run into, the moly XIX. that can be made out of all their long declamation is only "a fort of union between the bread " remaining in its own substance and the Deity of the word, by which union it becomes pro-" perly divine bread, and is made the body of "Christ, by assumption and indwelling of his fpirit." In consequence of which we find none of the subsequent Greek writers coming up to the present style of the church of Rome, nor yet adhering to the language of their own old Fathers, but contenting themselves with the confused and peculiar way that this Nicene, which they call their feventh general council, had led them into. Examples of this have been again and again produced: But there is one that settles the point beyond contradiction: And it is the anfwer which the Patriarch of Constantinople Jeremias gave to the questions proposed to the Greeks by the Cardinal of Guise in 1563, and is in these terms, "We believe and confess that the bread " is so changed into the body, and the wine so " changed into the blood of Christ, that neither "the bread, nor the accidents of the substance " of it remain, but are transelemented into a di-" vine substance." Which declaration cannot be reconciled with transubstantiation, tho' then established; as accidents are not capable of it, nor dos the church of Rome herself require it: But it lets us fee what impropriety of fentiment the latter Greeks were driven to, by their supposing 2

Now as the corruption of doctrine among the Greeks was occasioned by their departing from the language of their forefathers, so among the change of accidents into a substance, which is the greatest of all philosophic absurdities.

ins the same cause produced the same effect, LETTER e gradually indeed with them than with the XIX. eks, but, to make up for that, with a great of more noise. The decree of the second icil of Nice about images being brought inne West under the Pope's patronage, immeely raifed a flame. The Emperor Charlene made a book be written on purpose, and ished the sentence of a Western council on subject: In both which it appears, that the er's ardour against the Greeks has occasioned expressions which, however capable of a i fense, certainly carry a strange sound, and i either to mistake or confound the meaning is adversaries: And yet, notwithstanding of the use which the Romanists would be makof these writings, in support of their Euchac scheme, there is nothing in them that can 1 be forced so much as to imply transubstan-For while on the one hand they deny Eucharist to be "an image," yet they no re go the length of calling it "properly," the y of Christ, but for the most part add the d "facrament or mystery" to the description. wever, from this we see that the contention ut image-worship, in defence of it in the East, in condemnation of it in the West, has been original fource of the change, if not of doce, yet of style in both East and West about Eucharistic institution. Yet, as I said, it is y in found that hitherto we have feen any ig like a change in the West. But this opena door to greater alterations. For about ty years or so, after the publication of the oline books, Paschasius Radbert, sirst Monk then Abbot of Corbie near Amiens, wrote his LETTER book "Of the body and blood of the Lord, XIX. in which he lays down these three positions "That the Eucharist is the true body and true blood of Jesus Christ: That the substance of the bread and wine does not remain after confectation; and, that it is the same body which was born of the Virgin." The Romanists all allow that this Paschasius was the first who dif-

tinctly and of purpose delivered what they call the Catholic Doctrine of the Eucharist, and they are all full in his praises upon that account. But his doctrine did not pass without contradiction even in his own day. For it was foon combated by Amalarius Archdeacon of Tryers, by Rabanus Maurus Archbishop of Mentz, by Heribold Bishop of Auxerre, and sundry others, men of as great note and esteem for learning and piety as himself. A renowned philosopher from these Northern isles, a John Scott Erigena, whom writers differ about whether he was a Scotchman or an Irishman, appeared keenly against Paschastus, and opposed his doctrine with great acuteness: For which reason, notwithstanding of his great parts and established fame, which made him as honour to any country, and procured him the particular esteem of the great English Monarch Alfred, he is branded with herefy by the bigotted Romanists of latter days. Yet our own Bishop Leslie, who was as much attached to the doctrines of his church as any of them, but possessed of more candour than most of them, in his history of Scotland which he wrote at Rome under the

"King Alfred caused him to be numbered among Christ's martyrs, and erected a noble monument for for Pope's eye, speaks otherwise of this Scotus, and expressly says that, "by the Pope's authority the

SCOTLAND.

m in the abbey of Malmsbury:" Which LETTER at at that time he was in great repute XIX.

Rome, and in Bishop Leslie's opinion, Baronius, Cressy, and the rest of them Scot. lib. v.

afterwards said to the contrary.

all the antagonists whom the Paschasian to encounter there is none more con-

all the antagonists whom the Paschasian I to encounter, there is none more conor who gave them more trouble, than n, or Bertram, Abbot of Orbais, whose the fubject, dedicated to the Emperor he Bald, is so clear and pointed against ern faith of the Romish church in this hat fome of them have attempted to give forged by the Swifs Reformer Oecolam-This new attempt, therefore, of Paschaot as yet be called the doctrine of the cahurch, as it was opposed by so many frepute, who all lived and died even in nish communion: And tho' it had met opposition, it would hardly be fair to insubstantiation from it. For amidst all ency he feems to have that way, he frecalls the Eucharist the "mystical body and of Christ, true slesh mystically, slesh made y a substantial conversion, but by the ption of the word, &c." and he expressly that the church of Rome now as expressly that there is any thing of miracle in it. rd, from the writings of those times, upon les, we find the currency of undisputed have been, according to the old beginhe Canon of the Mass, that " in the very ent of the confecration, at the prayer of riest, the oblation is carried by angels to ltar on high, that is, Christ himself, who th altar and facrifice, and that by touch-

 \mathbf{O}

LETTER " ing of him, it is made one body with him XIX. Words which necessarily infer an union, not a identity, of the Eucharist with the body of Christ and come nearer to express a consubstantiation than any thing else.

Thus matters stood thro' the tenth century which Baronius emphatically calls " an age or "iron and lead," and people spoke and wrote upon this mystery, as devotion or superstition le them. In the next age, appeared Berengarius Archdeacon of Angers, who in some measure re vived the primitive doctrine, and in a letter to Lanfranc, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury defends John Scott from the charge of herely for writing against Pachasius. This letter was sent to Rome, where it was fo ill thought of, that it one council there, and in another at Verceil, both held by Pope Leo IX. in the year 1050, Berengarius, tho' absent and unheard, was con demned as an heretic. Five years after this he was cited to a council at Tours under Victor II where it is faid he was forced to abjure his opi Yet in the year 1059 Pope Nicholas II fummoned him to Rome, and obliged him to fign a recantation, which was penned by the Car dinal Humbert, and afterwards inferted into the Canon-law, but was fo excessive and hyperbolical that the Glossa Decreti declares it to be more dan gerous than the herefy itself. However he too courage again, and retracted his former recant tion, protesting against the violent methods the had been used with him. This made Gregor VII. call a fifth council about this business: Rome in the year 1078, in which he was again driven to subscribe another form of confession, d claring that "the bread and wine upon the:

are, by the mysterious operation of the LETTER fecration, and by the words of our Savi- XIX. , fubstantially changed into the true, pro-, and quickening body and blood of Jesus ist, not only figuratively and facramentally, truly, properly and substantially." ese rigours could not convince, tho' they some measure silence him: For he died in belief, and in church communion about ars after, and is well spoken of after all by confiderable writers of these times. prove of the man's variable conduct on e hand, nor of the unrelenting severities of ponents on the other: Only I think it is t from his history, that the Paschasian dochad not been univerfally received even in y, fince neither fuch learned defenders of anfranc of Canterbury, nor fuch powerful rs of it as even the fiery Gregory VII. either by persuasion or terror get one poor man to be filent about it. wever, all this was a paving the way for what ed: For about the middle of the next cenind fifty years or fo after this contest, a Stephen of Autun, emboldened by the gradual apnes made towards a full description, in the encounters with Berengarius, adventured, in ok Of the Sacrament of the Altar, to speak of is into the ch. 13,14 ly and blood of our Saviour." And this, by stimony of all writers, is the first time that this tant and distinguishing vocable of transubition made its public appearance, tho' it was or some time at least, much made use of her writers. Yet in the continuation of n by Abbot Bower, we meet with it in an

O 0 2

LETTER extract which he gives us from an old box XIX. written by Joceline a Monk of Furnes, and de dicated to our King William, where we find the words, "S. Waldeve one day celebrating mai " when elevating the host in the midst of the " fervice, he had uttered the effective facrame " tal words by which the bread is transubstantist " into the body and the wine into the bloo Scotichron. " he found in his hands a little infant, &c." 1. vi. c. 1. these be Joceline's own words, as I cannot l fure, not having feen his performance but: Bower's copy, it would feem that Stephen Autun's new coined phrase had gained grout and wrought itself into vogue, by means of or of those infantile apparitions which the new do trine, we are told by others of its favourers, w fo often in its early days attended with. How ever the found of it so mightily pleased Pope I nocent III. that he inferted it into the very fu of the feventy Canons which he proposed to the council of Lateran, and in which he declare that "the body and blood of our Saviour, in t " facrament of the altar, is truly contain " under the species of bread and wine, t " bread being by the divine omnipotence tra " fubstantiated into his body, and the wine in " his blood, that, for completing the mysterio " union between Christ and his church, we m " receive his human nature, as he was pleaf " to take ours." Here then at last is an appearance of the a thority of a general council to usher this long v thority of a general council to usher this long we heard-of doctrine into the world. Yet after a we may say it is but an appearance. For, I sides that these Canons were only Innocent's of sabrication, and not the voice of the council, a d before, and tho' his nephew Gregory LETTER o at some distance succeeded him, engros- XIX. m into the body of the decretals which ished, vet he did it, not as the decrees of ncil, but as fo many dictates of Innocent council, contrary to his custom in every ase: And they were never published as 10ns of the council of Lateran for more ree hundred years, till Cochlæus took upto do it in the year 1538, when Luther's tion was gaining ground. Therefore tho d be faid that our church was represented council, by the presence of three of her , it will not follow, that the doctrines estain these canons were at that time, or to wards the doctrines of our church, upon ting of a general council's authority, fince re not the council's joint production, and declarative of either the present belief, or consent of the Scottish church.

...

as been faid, I know, that the pretended council of Florence under Pope Eugene the year 1439 made the same decision in istruction to the Armenians: But over and he former objection holding here, of this tion being the fingle work of the Pope, and the council jointly, it is certain that there the least mention of the word transubstanin it, tho' we acknowledge that the fense s fully enough expressed. We own too is canon of; Pope Innocent introduced some ractices, as confequential to the doctrine he designed to establish: For Honorius, imediately succeeded him, appointed a kind ration to be paid to the host by a devout g of the head, tho' he does not found this upon

LETTER upon ancient practice, only commands the Pr But Gregory IX. XIX. to exhort the people to it. came after him, went more resolutely to w and ordered a bell to be rung at the elevat to give notice of it, that all who heard the might fold their hands and kneel in worship to God. Yet still the Lateran council's au rity was not fo univerfally acknowledged, but there long subfifted differences and disputes a the doctrine held forth in it; Nor did the mish church herself receive the determina made at this time, with that submission which professes to pay to former councils. So that. on the whole, tho' most of the school div have been willing to admit the authority of the Lateran Canons, out of veneration to their great Popes, Innocent II. who framed them, Gregory IX. who inserted them into his decret yet to find a Roman Catholic council and I by the whole of them as general, which has let transubstantiation as a necessary article of rel ous faith, we must come far down below they 1215 for it, even to the year 1551, and to thirteenth fession of a council held at Trent eleventh day of October that year, by four gates from Rome, nine Archbishops, thirty Bishops, three Abbots, and one General, mal in all fifty three persons, among whom there not one person from the heretical country Britain, and even from the Catholic kingdor France only one fingle man, the Bishop of ' Yet fuch a scanty and packed conven took upon them to impose this long conter doctrine upon the world, and with the force

an Anathema too, by a Canon in these ter

ment of the Eucharist the substance of the LETTER bread and wine remains with the body and XIX. ' blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and shall deny that wonderful and fingular conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, the species only of the bread and wine remaining, which conversion the Catholic * church has for weighty reasons called Transub-" stantiation, let him be Anathema." This was fixing the point for ever, and effectually stopping he mouths of gainfayers. Yet the none of their communion durst speak out after this solemn denunciation at Trent, there were many of them who grumbled not a little about it: And even some of their principal writers are forced to confels, that transubstantiation has no certain foundation either in scripture or reason, but depends entirely on tradition and ecclefiastical authority. However, fince this decision of their last general council, it has become the distinguishing article of their creed on the one hand, and the great butt of dispute to their antagonists on the other. And in this condition I shall leave it; as it would be a tedious matter, and quite foreign to my design, to enter into the merits of a cause, which for these two hundred years past, has made no little noise in the christian world: Only I could not omit offering this short historical deduction of its conception and growth, as the fending it abroad, in presence of some of our Scottish Bishops, was among the first ecclesiastical transactions of Alexander the Second's reign.

I am, &c.

LETTER

LETTER XX.

LETTER XX.

The Kingdom of Scotland laid under an Interdist

—Reflections on this cruel Invention, as practised by the Church of Rome—The Pope sends Legates into Scotland for raising Contributions —Holds a Council at Lyons, and deposes the Emperor—Authorises Provincial Councils in Scotland—Introduction of two new Monastic Orders into this Kingdom.

church was thrown into great confusion, by the spiritual tyranny of the church of Rome, an instance of which had been exhibited some years before in the neighbouring kingdom. For John, at that time King of England, by his bearing too hard, as was said, upon the church, had irritated Pope Innocent to such a degree, that he laid the King and all the kingdom under a general interdict, which continued for more than six years:

Till at last the poor King sound himself obliged, for the safety of his crown, to come into the Pope.

rms, and made that scandalous surrender LETTER ngdom to the Legate Randulphus, which th of Rome, tho' to her own difgrace, poasts of to this day. However, the oprty, with the affiftance of Louis, fon to ch King, kept up the quarrel: And our er coming, in the mean time, to the nd being provoked by John's repeated nto Scotland, raifed an army and attackemy in their own country. Upon this who now held himself as superior England, took the cause in hand, and by e Gualo, a man who, the Popish histomselves say, stuck at nothing for lucre, vhole kingdom of Scotland under an in-Tho' it had formerly been threatened, e first time we find our church actually this late invention of papal cruelty; an indeed which none, who had the least or the spiritual good of mankind, would thought of. Accordingly we meet with of this kind in those early ages, when th in general, and the Bishops of Rome ılar, were possessed of as much power as :flary for the real interests of religion. er they had any title to claim afterwards. at a time when the church was in a fufpacity of enforcing her fentences by the of the temporal powers, we hear of no our, exercised upon nations or national , tho' in those days there were Bishops , fuch as Julius and Innocent and Leo zory, the first and best of their names, e as well acquainted with the true rights the church in general, or their own see ular, and as zealous in support of these Pр

LETTER rights as any of the same names that came a them. Nor were opportunities wanting for st ing such rigour, if it had been thought ei necessary or lawful. There were christian Prin then, no better than in latter times. The Kings of France, of the race of Clovis, were petually haraffing one another, and filling country with bloodshed and devastation. In Saxon heptarchy of England, the case was better, not only while they were heathens, t even after their respective conversions to christ The Popes indeed and the other Bish did often on such occasions interfere, as mediate of peace, with their advice and fatherly intreati and fometimes they succeeded, and sometimes n But they never thought of judicial fulmination much less of disgracing their character, by t promiscuous injustice of general interdicts.

This wanton stretch of usurped authority w referved for the ages of corruption and ignoran when the Popes were now arrived to the lor defired height of grandeur and wealth, and t other governors of the church, by some mea or other, humbled into a fad state of subjection and of what might properly enough be called flavish infignificancy. It was then that this n scheme of interdicting whole churches was fi introduced. And a most impious, as well as p nicious scheme it certainly was. For by this se tence, as in the case before us, all public worst was prohibited, the churches were shut up, t administration of the facraments was suspende in a word, there was an universal cessation of facred offices, as long as the tyrannical fenter lasted. And what was assigned as the cause all this feverity? Not any error in faith, or brea of morality, or any of those transgressions, which LETTER. night come properly under the cognizance of the thurch, and either deferved or incurred her cenures: But what was then thought a more attroious crime, affronting the Pope's personal pride, nd touching what he pretended to call his worldy property. It feems our church had, as occa-ion offered, held communion with the English hurch, while King John and his friends lay unler the Pope's excommunication; and now upon change of measures, as is usual among Kings, our King had made war upon John, after the Pope nd he were reconciled.* This was a double provocation, and could not be put up with. he interdict came out, and continued for some ime, till by the mediation of friends, a peace was concluded between our Alexander and the young Henry who had lately succeeded his father John, on which the King was absolved, tho' much against the Legate's will, by the Bishops of York

* We may observe from this part of our history, that even at hat time, and under all that cloud of darkness which had overpread the face of almost the whole christian church, our church was not so very blindly obsequious to the church of Rome as to realways led by her directions in every part of public procedure, when we fee that even the Pope's formal excommunications did not always restrain her communion. Neither were these excom-munications always regarded even in the church of England herself, which was then more at the Pope's beck than our church ever was: For we read of the renowned Robert Grosthead Bishop of Lincoln, who died in 1253, that at his departure there was 2 heavenly harmony heard, because he had been unjustly excommunicated by Pope Innocent IV. from which unjust sentence he appealed to the great judge, and expired with that appeal in his mouth. On which my author remarks, " Neither does it hin- Scotichron. "der tho' it be faid, Whatsoever thou bindest, &c. for this is lib. x. c: 3. to be understood only, (clave non errante) if the judgment be Collier, b. v. p. 463.

" not erroneous."

P p 2

LETTER and Durham. However the Legate, not to mi XX. his market altogether, and under pretence that the clergy were not included in that absolution, mas them pay well for the favour before they on tained it. On which Abbot Bower makes the fensible reflection, "Thus our clergy, fearing fo "their coats more than their consciences, sub 46 mitted to a judge who was not their judge, " and were taught by this man's tyranny to stand " up better in defence of of their privileges and " of the liberties of the kingdom in time to " come. For by this relation it appears, that " our then prelates had been either too indolent, " or quite ignorant of their rights, in yielding " to fuch an extortion which, instead of a thousand " merks which their standing out might have " cost them, carried off from them, and with their " public shame too, no less than ten thousand Scotichron. " pounds." They did indeed complain to Rome, Lix. c. 32. and had address enough to get the Legate cenfured: But the Pope and he divided the money between them, and the poor appellants came home again with empty purses.

Thus ended this vexatious affair, the first of the kind that had been heard of here: But it opened a door for the many encroachments of a like nature which our nation groaned under for more than three hundred years after: For althouthe Pope at this time, to make the clergy some amends for the loss of their money, and at the King's pressing suit, made a pretence of renewing their former privileges; yet within a year or so, he dispatched another Legate into Scotland to raise contributions for the Holy war, which were liberally granted both by clergy and laity, but whether thrown away by the Legate's extravagance, or taken from him by robbers, as LETTER the man gave out, never came into the Pope's coffers. However, these demands began now to be so impudently frequent, and at the same time so intolerably oppressive, that the King's eyes were opened, and he expressly prohibited the next Legate that was fent, whose name was Otho. from entering the kingdom. He had had an interview with him at York, whither he had gone to wait on his brother in law Henry IIL of Engand; And when the Legate notified to him his defign of coming into Scotland, to collect the tenths of the ecclesiastical revenues for the Pope's service, the King told him, as Matthew Paris, a co-temporary writer, informs us, "That he "did not think it necessary to invite a person " of his character into Scotland, neither would "he for his part give way to fuch uncustomary "methods, as the business of the church there "was. God be thanked, in a good enough pos-"ture: And therefore, if his eminence would " venture, he had better take care that no mif-"fortune happened: For, fays the King, you will be in danger of meeting with rugged "and fanguinary people upon the road, neither is it in my power to check their fallies if they " fall upon you." When the Legate heard this, collier, he altered his resolution, and returned with King b.v. p. 438. Henry to London. Yet in two years after, the king relaxed, for some reason or other, and gave the same Legate his permission to come into Scotland, where he accordingly made his appearance. However, this shews us that, either our Kings had a just title to admit or prohibit these foreign missionaries as they judged expedient, or that the

Legates, tho' fortified by the Pope's authority,

AX. mission in the face of danger or inconvenience But whatever title the Popes might pretenseither from canon or custom, to this piece of purogative, it certainly turned out, as they used to be the deepest wound that the old regul discipline of the church ever felt: Since it not only infringed the jurisdiction of the several I shops in their respective charges, but likewing tended to make them contemptible in the people eyes, by thus subjecting them to a man who notwithstanding his external pomp and adventing our designation of Cardinal, was for the molepart only in Priest's, and many times but in Deacon's orders. Which very encroachment, has there been nothing else faulty in the Roman sylventic.

tem, was enough to have fet all the national churches in the world against it, and put then out of conceit with a fystem which so pertinacious

ly authorised a practice so very derogatory to the honour and privileges of Apostolic Episcopacy In the year 1240 Pope Gregory IX. summon ed all the Prelates of Christendom to a counci at Rome: In obedience to which mandate, Da vid Bishop of St. Andrews and William of Gla gow set out on their journey, but in travelling thro' Germany, were made prisoners by the Emperor Frederick, who suspected the Pope's design and were obliged to return home, after fending proctors in their names to Rome another way.

But the council did not hold; for the Pop died in the mean time. His successor Innoces IV. in prosecution of the standing quarrel wit the Emperor, called another council to meet Lyons in France in the year 1246, where the ved from their allegiance, and a folemn excom-LETTER unication pronounced against all who should for abet him in that character. Yet in spite ~ this extraordinary and unchristian sentence, the nperor stood his ground, and kept the crown his head till he was taken off by poison five ars after. Such perseverance in bitterness by many Popes against a Sovereign, whom every prejudiced writer speaks well of, needs no com-This disloyal and uncharacteristic spirit d blazed forth with particular vehemence about o hundred years before, when Gregory VII. hared the Emperor Henry IV. at fuch a strange and precedented rate; and down to this time, thro' a ccession of nine Emperors and no fewer than enty four Popes, the war had been kept up, on e Pope's fide, with all the fire of rage and fury at irreconcilable malice could raise. It is needs to offer any strictures upon this unaccountable d inexcusable behaviour of these turbulent and ibitious Popes: The terrible effects which it duced, and the rending the empire into the o well known parties of Guelphs and Gibeles, the first for the Pope and the other for the aperor, mark it in stronger colours than any aracter that can be given of it.

Three years after this council of Lyons, King exander died, in the fifty first year of his age, d thirty fifth of his reign. All our historians every denomination agree in their encomiums on him: And Abbot Bower speaking of his ath fays, "that having received the facraments of eternal falvation, his happy foul was taken from this life, and, as piety leads us to believe, Scotichr. is now placed with all the faints in heaven." et we do not read of his having been put into a ottish Kalendar, which he ought to have been,

LETTER according to Bower's principles, and in confor XX. ty to the Trent decision, that "the faints reign with Christ are to be worshipped and inv ed." In his time there was a national co cil held at Perth in the year 1221, by James Pope's Legate: And four years after, a mand came from Pope Honorius III. to all the Biffs of Scotland, by which, after having told the that, for want of a Metropolitan by whose aut rity they might regularly hold provincial con cils, the canons were not duly observed, many other abuses happened, he therefore joins them to convene by his authority, and he provincial councils, which, he fays, ought not be omitted. In consequence of this mandate, upon receiving it, the Bishops held a national provincial council of all the Prelates in the kir dom, in which they regulated the form of ho ing such meetings, and enacted: That accordi to the canons of the church, a provincial com should be holden every year, at which all t Bishops, Abbots and Priors should assist, to relate all ecclesiastical affairs: That at each count one of the Bishops should be chosen by comm consent, under the title of Conservator, to pres instead of a Metropolitan, and who in that qu lity should be empowered by the authority of council to punish all transgressors of the statut That at each council the Bishops should pre by turns, beginning with the Bishop of St. ! Crit. Essay, drews, &c. Upon this new concession of P. 590,591. Pope's, I must beg leave to make a few obser tions.

1. The Pope pretends to grant it by way favour, as if the Bishops had not an inher right, by virtue of their Episcopal office, to ad-

one another, and by mutual confent to ap-LETTER. what they should judge most conducive to terests of that portion of the church, whet be called national or provincial, that was This was undeniably itted to their charge. rm in ancient times, when many fuch counere held, without the Pope's authority, and without his knowledge: And his mandate s time was but an assumed concession of auy to do, what, upon the primitive plan, our ps had authority enough of their own to do ut it. If it shall be faid, in the Pope's bethat his zeal rather deserves commendation. is rebuking, as it were, the negligence of Sishops, and stirring them up to their duty; be remembered that, as times then were, it iot very fafe for them to meddle even thus thout his concurrence, lest he should raise nour against them, and set aside their auative acts by the pretended plenitude of his , which was now become an object of al-

general awe and terror.
The Pope founds the reason of this concessful, on their want of a Metropolitan.—what was this want owing to? The Archo of York had once claimed that title, wheustly or not, and the Pope had taken it from

Why did not his Holiness, out of the plee of his power, give them another, if a Melitan was so necessary for holding councils rectifying abuses? Was it fair or kind in to keep them so long in an orphan or disaste, even the was willing to have immediately depending upon himself, when as so sensible of the inconveniencies attendant dependance? But this is not all. For Q q

LETTER how can it be faid that they wanted a Metron XX. litan? Where was now the remembrance of that we find in our old historians of the Bish of St. Andrews being the "primus or maxin" Scotorum Episcopus," the first or principal shop of Scotland? This title was acknowledge a hundred years before this time, even by an Elishman Nicholas, who, in a letter to Each then elect of St. Andrews, expressly calls the Introd. Ch. Shop of that see the "highest Bishop of "Scots," and from that precedence draws an gument against the Archbishop of York's p tensions. Had not this highest Bishop, (who, same Nicholas says, was equal to an Archbish tho' "the rudeness of the nation did not kn "the use of the pall,") power to convocate brethren, either to occasional meetings, or to canonical ones, which were to be held at say feafons? 3. From the practice which followed upon t papal mandate it is evident, that the Pope h made the Bishops believe that a fixed Metro litan was not effential to the constitution of provincial council, but that every fuch meeti might chuse any one they pleased to preside, der the new fashioned name of Conservator. 1 we find that in the year 1420 William Bill of Dumblaine, and in 1459 Thomas Bishop Aberdeen acted in this capacity; from which appears that the office was elective and aml latory, and that the Pope's main view, with this pretence of care, had been to humble " highest Bishop of the Scots," by putting h on a level with the rest of his brethren, lest fhould at any time, like his neighbour of C terbury, turn too proud of his inherent hono d prove upon some occasions refractory and LETTER manageable.

However, fuch as it was, our Bishops took old of the Pope's concession, and held a second ational council in virtue of it, some time after ne year 1230; in the account of which, as prerved in the chartulary of Moray, we have the rm of the Bishop Conservator's indicting or myocating the yearly council, "authoritate confervatoria" as the act bears, by his confervamial.authority charging each Bishop, in a parcular letter, to give his presence at such a place, which was commonly the convent of the Black riars in Perth) on such a day with continuation f days, and to bring with him the Abbots and riors, with proctors from the chapters, colleges and convents of his diocese, there to treat of the formation of the state of the church, and such ther matters as should come before them.

Under this King it was, that first the Dominian Monks, and foon after them the Franciscans ot footing in Scotland. The first of these orens was instituted by a Dominic, a Spaniard of ood extraction, who had fignalized himself by peculiar degree of zeal in preaching and foliting expeditions against the Albigenses. Thefe exple, so called from the diocese of Albi in the outhern parts of France, where they were most umerous, had imbibed the tenets of Berengariwhom I spoke of before, and had added to me peculiar doctrines which they are charged ith, the then greatest of all heresies, a contempt the Pope's authority, and a fetting themselves a opposition to that excessive stretch of dominin which he was every where grasping at. take upon me to determine the character of Qq2 thefe

LETTER these Albigenses, who are held forth in a m despicable light by the Popish party, and who another class of writers magnify, perhaps to much, as an example worthy of imitation i throwing off all ecclefiastical subjection whatever Neither does it much concern our present in quiry, whether Arnold of Brescia, who was perfecuted at Rome in the twelfth century, or Raymond the old Count of Tholouse, who about this time was ruined in France, for standing up 2gainst the papal tyranny, were to be commended or not. My only reason for mentioning the Albigenfes is, their having been the occasion of bringing this Dominic so much into the Pope's favour, that in the year 1216 he got his order established by Pope Honorius, notwithstanding of Pope Innocent's thirteenth Canon against admiting any new orders, proposed in the Lateran council the very year before. These Monks are called Jacobins, from a house they had in the Rue St. Jacques in Paris, and Black Friars, from their ha-But the title they glory most in, is Predicants or preaching Friars, from their order having been originally intended for the conversion of heretics, in which they pretend to have been fignally zealous as well as fuccessful; and for which reason, since ever that most horrid engine of Antichristian barbarity has been established upon the plan laid by their Patron and Founder Dominic, they have been entrusted with the fole management of it, and pride themselves in being called the Fathers of the Inquisition. They were brought into Scotland by William Malvoisin Bishop of St. Andrews in the year 1230, and in a short time obtained no less than fifteen convents in different places of the country. The next year the Fran-ans or Grey-Friars, called also Minorites LETTER profession of extraordinary humility, came XX. the fame Bishop's invitation, and soon hemselves to a vast extent also. Their was Francis an Italian, born at Affise, emporary with Dominic, of whole austed mortifications the popish writers are so t they tell us, tho' the account borders ipon blasphemy, that the very marks of iour's wounds were imprinted miraculoufhis hands and feet. These two orders. y be called twins of much the same age, their institution tied down to perpetual , excluded from all property either private c, and allowed no subsistence but what uld procure by daily begging. Yet they o fooner fettled any where, than they lost fight of these restrictions, and of all mility and difinterestedness which their on so peremptorily enjoined, and in a ne not only became the wealthiest and werful of all the monastic tribes, but liked fuch frequent brawls and contentions e another about dignity and precedence, feveral Princes and even the Popes themvany times found it a difficult matter to em within proper bounds.*

I am, &c.

ever would know more of them, and of the various that kind which filled this poor country of Scotland different defignations of Benedictines, Cistercians, Carthusians, &c. may consult a most accurate actem drawn up by the laird of Macsarlane, and pubg with Bishop Keith's catalogue of the Bishops of

LETTER

LETTER XXI.

LETTER XXI.

Accession of Alexander III.—He recovers the Western Isles, and adds another Bishoprick to the national Church—Struggles against the coming of more Legates from Rome, but in vain—Various other Instances of Papal Oppression—Untimely Death of Alexander III.

A.D. 1249.

Alexander, then but in the eighth year of his age, succeeded to the throne: At whose co-scotichron. ronation, we are told, there unexpectedly apl. x. c. 2. peared an old man, with venerable grey hairs, b. 4. c. 11. who, tho' a wild highlander, was genteelly dressed in a scarlet cloak, and submissively falling on his knees, addressed the young King with the sollowing salutation in the Gaelic language, "Be" nach de Re Albin Alexander, MacAlexander, and MacWilliam, MacHenry, MacDavid, MacMal" colm, MacDuncan," &c.; that is, "Blessings" on thee Alexander King of Scotland, son of Alexander, son of William, son of Henry,

m of David," &c. and so traced back the LETTER ealogy up to Fergus fon of Ferchard, and XXI. ' him to the supposed founder of the first ssian colony from Spain. This compliment by the old Seanachie has been laid hold of he abettors of our high antiquities, to prove favourite point of the long succession of s: But even this proof feems to stand on weak and fallacious ground. That it was nealogy the man defigned to give, is evident; whether of Kings or not, we cannot fay. In lift he gave, we know there are some who r came to the throne, Beatrix, for instance, ner to Duncan, and Henry, father to Willi-And numbers were omitted who either of the collateral line, as the christian Doin the first race, and the great Gregory in fecond, or who left no issue, as Edgar and first Alexander. So that nothing can be e of this long scroll of names but a vain of ancestry, which we are sure the beggar as well as the King, and which would have the Seanachie only a few more Macs and a more stretch of memory to have carried to the flood or beyond it, like the attempt e by a curious gentleman in the last, cento carry up the pedigree of the Urquharts of narty to Noah. his King's reign was, as minorities for the

: part are, at first a little troubled by the lations of the Nobles about the public mament: But these contentions by degrees subl, and his government, which lasted thirty n years, turned out to be as conspicuous as of any of his predecessors had been. He recred the Western Isles from the Kings of Norway

Norway who had kept possession of them so XXI. before Malcolm Canmore's accession, and conquered the Isle of Mann, which till then the for a long time been under a succession of puty Kings of its own. This enlargement of the ritory brought an addition of another Bishop our national church who, as long as Episcope stood on the footing of public establishment, to his seat in our Episcopal college by the title Bishop of Sodor or the Isles.* But when Man was rent from the crown of Scotland, the

* This little isle of Mann, which is almost equally contigu to all the three kingdoms of Scotland, England, and Irela had fallen into the hands of the Norwegians about the time MacBeth's usurpation: For in an old chronicle of the Ki of Mann, published by Camden along with his Britannia, find a Godred fon of Syrric reigning in Mann in 1047; upon his death in 1066, a Godred Crovan making himself r ter of it, in whole posterity the possession of it continued, un acknowledgement of the King of Norway's superiority, till 12 that Alexander recovered it again to his crown, to which seems it had belonged, at least ever since the union of the kingdoms under Kenneth MacAlpin. His father, the chron tells us, had prepared a great fleet for fubduing it and the o isles, but died in a fever, in an island called Kerwaray, be he could put his design into execution. From this time it mained subject to our Kings for near a hundred years, till a V liam Montague, who pretended some relation to the old N wegian race, raised a body of English soldiers, and drove Scots out of it; but having contracted a load of debt in the terprise, was obliged to pledge his conquest, with all the prt of it, to Anthony Beck Bishop of Durham for seven years. the end of which term it returned to his fon the carl of & bury, who in 1393 fold it for a great fum of money to Will Scroop, who being soon after attainted and beheaded for trea it fell into the hands of Henry IV. who had lately feized English crown. Henry then bestowed it with the title of I on his favourite Henry Piercy Earl of Northumberland, and his being killed in the civil wars of these times, he next gav to John Stanley, predecessor to the Earls of Derby: In w thopi floprick was also necessarily divided. So the rest LETTER of the isless had a Bishop of their own, who for XXI.

a long time had his cathedral in Icolmkill: And the English Bishop of Mann was made suffragan to the Archbishop of York, but has never yet obtained the additional honour of being a Lord of Parliament.

In the eleventh year of Alexander the Third's reign, the Pope's nuncio Pontius came to York, and cited the Prelates of Scotland to attend him there. But the King taking this citation to be derogatory to his royalty, and an invasion on the liberties of the kingdom, put a stop to it, by appealing to the Pope. In the year 1266 the Cardinal Legate Ottobon wrote from London to the Bishops of Scotland, demanding payment of four merks from every parish-church, and six from every cathedral within the kingdom, in name of procuration-money: Which the King at first, by the advice of his clergy, forbade to be paid, but foon after, by some persuasion or other, yielded so far to Ottobon's demand as to allow fix pence of every merk to be paid to him, and five pence to another Cardinal Hubert, notwithstanding the appeal he had made to Rome against fuch demands, fix years before. For, fays my author, "as long as the King and the clergy were unanimous, they manfully defended their 44 rights: But the King being by some evil

Samily it continued without interruption till towards the end of the last century, that it came by a marriage into the Scottish faily of Athol, who enjoyed the property of a great part of it, at the sovereignty of the whole, under the title of Kings in Mann for about a hundred years, when for reasons of state the town redeemed the sovereignty, but left the private property in the samily's possession.

" minded

LETTER " minded counsellors alienated from the cler XXI. " the church matters were not fo well cared f "Yet when the King and they were recond Scotichron 4 again, they went more advisedly to work. lib. x.c. 22. "For foon after this there came a message fr " the Legate desiring the King's leave to ma "his visitation thro' Scotland, which the Kin " upon confultation held with the clergy, " remptorily refused." The historians speak riously of the King for thus altering his cond in these matters, tho' it is probable, he had I ficient reasons for so doing. He had no do heard of the disturbance which Becket had rai in England; and in case of a rupture with Romish see, he was not sure how steadily clergy would stand by him against the Pope, that he was obliged to act cautiously, and acc modate himself as well as he could to the seven dispositions of men and times. Such was the tuation which crowned heads then stood in, respect to the church, that, for the peace of the kingdoms, they durst hardly venture either to strain or patronize the clergy to any great gree, but were obliged to alter their managen as tempers altered, and according to the hum of the feveral Popes they had to deal with. In the year 1268 all the Bishops of Scotl

In the year 1268 all the Bishops of Scotl were summoned by Ottobon to appear be him within sourteen days after Easter, to he council with him in any place where he plea. This was arbitrary in the extreme, and probabling designed in revenge for the King's having merly forbidden him access into the kingdon However the Bishops deputed Richard Bishop Dunkeld and Robert of Dumblaine in their na and the other clergy the Abbot of Dunferr

d the Prior of Lindores, to attend the Legate, LETTER d to take care that nothing should pass in their XXI. fence to their prejudice. Mr. Collier fays that fynod was held at London, and that besides Collier, English Prelates, the Pishops of Wales, Ire-b.v. p.474. nd and Scotland were present at it. He says ther that the Canons then made were of great thority, and that notwithstanding the change at reformation, many of them are still in force, d make part of the English Canon law at this y. He has not indeed particularised what these nding Canons are, nor can we suppose that he cludes in that number the first of them, which ders that "the Priests shall be perfect in the form of the facrament of baptifin, and shall repeat and expound it frequently to their congregations on Sundays, that so in case of necessity the laity may be in condition to baptize an infant." It is much to be questioned whether the records we have of any ancient council, ther provincial or general, can furnish an instance fuch a latitudinarian provision as is here made r the laity in general, and under the character laity to baptize, in any case and on any occan whatever. The great dispute between Cypriof Carthage and Stephen of Rome about the ptism administered by Heretics, does not touch is point in the least. For these heretics, of hatever denomination, either were, or pretended be, of the clergy: And we never read of any y person, simply as such, and without any prension to the clerical character in some part of it other, either in right claiming, or in fact excifing, this privilege of the ministerial office.w far these Heretics, upon leaving the church being thrown out of it, retained their former Rr2 powers, valid, is another question, and has no concent with the complexion of the present Canon. For it is as clear as any thing that history has hand ed down to us, that baptism was never administered, even among Heretics, but by those who professed to be in orders, thro' whatever hands on in whatever manner these orders were conferred. And this seems to be the first time that an open and avowed attempt was made to throw this part of the facred function into unauthorized hands even under the plea of necessity; tho' it has since been formally introduced by the Romish church both into doctrine and practice.

But be in this what may, and whatever shall be thought of these English Canons now-a-days, or own historians all agree that, when the Scottill deputies brought home a copy of these acts, ou church unanimously rejected them with this decla ration, "that they would acknowledge no fu tutes but such as proceeded either from th Pope or from a general council." By this de claration they screened themselves from the in positions of the Legate and the pretensions of the English church. But they foon had occasion t feel the effects of thus submissively giving then selves up to the Pope's personal decisions. The late Pope Urban IV. had made a decree the " every Bishop on his election should travel s "Rome for confecration;" a practice which ha been foolishly begun long ago, under a pretent of devotion, and was now enforced as an indi pensible duty. It happened that about this time there were no fewer than five fees vacant in Sco land, Ross, Brechin, Aberdeen, Caithness, and S Andrew's. Of these the elects of the first four, LETTER viz. Matthew for Ross, William for Brechin, XXI. Hugh Benham for Aberdeen, and Nicoll for Caithness went to Rome, where by reason of a competition for the papacy on the death of Clement IV. they were kept depending two years, all which time the King kept the revenues in his own hands, and the vacant dioceses suffered great inconvenience. The elect of Brechin died at Rome without consecration, he of Caithness was rejected, and at last upon the ending of the competition in savour of Gregory X. the elects of Ross and Aberdeen were consecrated by him at Viterbo.

During this vacancy at Rome, William Wishart elect of Glasgow was postulated* to succeed Bishop Gameline at St. Andrews, who hearing of the divisions about the papacy, would not go to Rome himself, but sent his agents to solicit his cause. This the Pope resented so highly, that had it not been for the intercession of Prince Edward of England who was then at Rome, and whom the Pope was not willing to disoblige, Wishart had lost his election. But at last a licence was granted for his confecration at home, which was accordingly performed at Scoon in the year 1273. Upon this Wishart's promotion, Abbot Bower has a very sensible reflection, "that it was by " many thought a wonderful thing that a man of "Wishart's great reputation, who was Arch-" deacon of St. Andrew's, Elect of Glasgow, Scotichr.

Chancellor of the kingdom, and either Rector 1. x. c. 28.
or Prebendary of no fewer than twenty two

A Bishop is said to be possibled, instead of elected, when he is called from one see to another.

Churches, should have the ambition to cover XXI. "the see of St. Andrews too." And he tells us afterwards that this was one reason why his suit met with such hindrance at Rome. Indeed this practice of holding a plurality of benefices was growing to a scandalous height, and was loudly complained of, even in these corrupted times.— The Popes issued out Bull after Bull against it, tho', as appeared from their own conduct, not so much out of hatred to the practice in general, as to keep the possession of such a lucrative privilege in their own hands: And this it was that encouraged the base practice in others, notwithstanding all the great shew of repeated decrees to the contrary.

Soon after Gregory's promotion to the papal chair, he called a general council to meet at Lyons in the year 1274, to which, by an agreement in a fynod at Perth, all our Bishops except those of Dunkeld and Moray were appointed to go. The holding of fuch meetings was now become very frequent; and every Pope almost challenged the honour of calling one, when and where he pleased. The old writers of the church complained much of the Emperor Constantius, for harassing the Bishops with attending council after council at his pleasure, and desolating the feveral churches by drawing off their Bishops to fuch distances. And yet the design of these councils, however they were managed, appears to have been quite within the sphere of ecclesiastical business, to settle the faith, or regulate the discipline, or establish the communion of the church But now the face of things was changed: And the main intention of fuch affemblies was to 25 grandize the see of Rome, and confirm the Popes

r by fubjecting all claims of whatever kind, LETTER oral as well as spiritual, to his sovereign de. XXI. ination. This council of Lyons, we are told, very grand as well as numerous, there being nt in it, two Patriarchs, fifteen Cardinals, five red Bishops, a thousand Abbots and Priors. es the Emperor of Greece, the King of ce, and many other Princes. There was a of union packed up in it, between the Greek Latin church: But as it flowed entirely from cal motives, and was artfully managed on fides, it was but of short duration. For the ks, immediately on the breaking up of the cil, retracted all that had been done on their and afferted their ancient and original inde-There was a regulation likewise made respect to the holders of pluralities, and restrictions laid on the Mendicants or beg-Friars. But all this came to nothing. pluralifts made a shift to evade the council's ee, and the mendicants bought off the restricwith large fums of money paid into the Indeed this feems to have been 's coffers. principal design of the meeting, under preof raising supplies for the Holy War. first subject of discussion was, "that all confors should urge their penitents to assist that usiness with their wealth and riches, that every ristian, of whatever sex or quality, should or fix years contribute a penny to it, under ain of excommunication, and that the tenth f all ecclesiastical benefices in Christendom ithout exception should be given to it for the me space." Accordingly the next year the e fent a nuncio into Scotland to collect these Scotch High. hs, who settled a table of taxations upon be lib, ch. iv.

nefices P. 195.

LETTER nefices to serve for a rule in after times. T XXI. man's name, it is said, was Bagimont, and fre him that table of taxations has been called Ba mont's Roll, by which the value of every benef was known, and paid for accordingly at the col of Rome. But Dr. Nicholson thinks this is or a feigned name, and that Bagimont's Roll amo us, may be the same, by a small variation found, with Ragman's Roll among the Engli But whoever was the author of this valuation it continued a standing imposition upon the 1 tion as long as the Pope's dominion kept up it, tho' it procured this advantage, under t pressure of such a burden, that when endeavou were used, as was often the case, to raise the val of the church-livings, on purpose to increase t profits of the court of Rome, appeals were ma to this roll as a fixed standard, and every enlarge ment above it was declared criminal by the la of the land. This was among the last ecclesiastical trans

tions of Alexander the third's reign, which so after began to be fadly clouded with domes misfortunes. By his queen Margaret, daughter Henry the Third of England, he had had t sons and a daughter. But first his Queen die Then his second son David. And not long ter his eldest son Alexander, who had lat married a daughter of the Earl of Flanders, v cut off without issue in the slower of his age. His daughter Margaret too, whom he had m ried to the King of Norway's eldest son, did I long survive her brothers, and lest only one fant daughter behind her. But this was not worst: The good King himself, now the alapha.

the prime of life, having with a view to fecure LETTER the fuccession, married a fecond wife, was, within a year after, most unfortunately killed by a fall from his horse at Kinghorn, in the forty sistematic of his age, and thirty seventh of his reign: A man no way inferior to the greatest of his predecessors either in public or private life, and one whose untimely death was just matter of universal lamentation on a double account; since it not only deprived the nation of a most worthy and deservedly revered Sovereign, but likewise opened a door to those terrible calamities which, by near forty years continuance, brought it to the very brink of destruction.

I am, &c.

Sf

LETTER

XXII.

LETTER XXII.

Death of Margaret, Grandchild of Alexander III.

——Competition for the Crown between Bruce and Baliol——Behaviour of the Clergy——And of the Pope on this Occasion——Success and Reign of Robert——His Death and Character——Account of John Scot of Dunse, and other Scottish Writers——And of the Knights Templars, and Knights of Malta.

N the death of Alexander III. Margaret his grand-child, Princess, and commonly called the Maiden of Norway, tho' a mere infant, was looked upon as his successor: And six Regents were appointed to act during her minority. A treaty of marriage was also concluded between the eldest son of Edward King of England, and the young Scottish Queen, who was now sent for, to fill the throne of her beloved grand-father. But being of a delicate constitution, she A. D.1293. died on her passage to Scotland; and the ambassadors had the mortification to bring nothing home

ne but the forrowful tidings. By this fatal LETTER nt, the fuccession to the Scottish crown was XXII. own open among a number of competitors, nearest of whom could claim no nearer to late King, than by descent from his grandle, David Earl of Huntingdon, who was youngrother to King William, and died in the year It was this remoteness of kin which oconed all the contention: For John Baliol was grand-fon of David's eldest daughter, and bert Bruce the fon of the second. Between le two noblemen the dispute rested: And re was no precedent in the Scottish history, direction in the constitution, by which such lifpute could be decided. So by unanimous fent of all parties, the decision was referred the arbitration of Edward I. of England, who ng now a fair opportunity of gratifying his nition by reviving and enforcing the old claim superiority or feudal sovereignty over Scoti, gladly undertook the office, and appointed invention of the Scottish nobility to meet him a certain day at Norham on the Tweed. Here put them in mind of his being by right of crown Superior and Lord Paramount of the gdom of Scotland, which right, he faid, he willing to wave for the prefent, and should as an impartial umpire, and common friend To this unwelcome hint, Robert Bishop Glasgow answered, that " it was sufficiently snown that Scotland, from the first foundation of the state, had been a free and independent tingdom, subject to no power whatever but to her own Kings, and therefore they hoped that he would proceed in the business as an equal and difinterested arbiter, which they and their $S f_2$ " posterity

LETTER " posterity should remember with gratitude." XXII. Edward was not pleased with the freedom of patriotic speech, but concealed his referement the time, and went on with the business: 1 to give the greater colour of equity to his cedure, he consulted the most learned civil both at home and abroad upon the subject. in this he did not act with all the candour t was necessary. For as, by virtue of his trust, had the fole title of proposing the question, took care always to clog it with the affertion his own fuperiority, without the least notice that fuperiority having been disowned on the fide, or renounced on the other. Accordingly find the answers returned by these civilians hampered by this restricting allegation of ward's, that tho' for the most part they app in favour of the proximity, which was the Bru plea, yet they all conclude with this condition clause of the "Fies's following the practice "the fuperior dominion." In consequence this opinion, and after an affected delay of se years, Edward gave fentence in favour of Bal and appointed him to fucceed to the crown Scotland, and to hold it of him as supreme L Against this sentence Bruce and his friends monstrated as vigorously as they could, and r ters were as confused as ever. But in a sl time the vassal King Baliol, either thro' his c weakness, or by reason of the divided state the nation, was forced to yield himself up to wald, who fent him prisoner to London, and a little while, at the Pope's intercession, dist fed him to France, where he spent the remain of his days in a private condition.

All this time the other competitor Rol was keeping up his claim the best way he LETTER And upon his death in the year 1295, XXII. Robert contended for his father's right, rted his title to the crown, but was preby death likewise, before a favourable opy offered. At last his fon, the brave and ed Robert Bruce, being joined by fuch of ntrymen as wished to rescue the nation at miserable state of slavery to which it jected, and having with undaunted couight his way thro' innumerable difficulties, emnly crowned at Scoon, on the twenty of March 1306, with the hearty applause greatest and best part of the kingdom. ll not enter into the merits of this impor-I much agitated controversy, nor take upafter so many able pens have been employooth fides of it, to determine where the y. All my defign in offering this short of fuch a critical era in our civil history, en up, if possible, some distinct view of e of the church, which in such a long contention and debate, could not fail to th perplexed and confused likewise. Nor be expected that the fentiments or conthe clergy would be unanimous or unithe occasion. The event was new and dented, without any precept in scripture, mple in history, any Canon of the church t them. Here was no infurrection against rereign, nor pretentions to popular author them, no mention of, because no room feiture or abdication, or any thing tending y: But the throne fairly empty by a viind of providence, and two heirs, as may , of undetermined titles claiming to fill it:

LETTER The estates of the kingdom, as they are no XXII. called, both unwilling and incapable to medd in fuch an intricate affair, and the powerful a biter, to whom the matter was referred, adin in fuch a manner as could neither be thoroughly approved nor fuccessfully resisted. It was no won der that men, and conscientious men too, should when left to their own opinions, see things in dif ferent points of view, and think themselves at li berty, confishently enough with character, to all in their feveral stations accordingly. Hence w find some of our Bishops acknowledging Baliol and even swearing fealty to Edward: Others or them as strenuous for Bruce's right, and suffer ing in his cause. The Bishop of St. Andrews Fraser, was so grieved at seeing his country thraldom, that he retired to France, leaving procuratory with two of his chaplains to supply his absence in all affairs of ecclesiastical cogniz ance, by whose authority, and under the protec tion of that mirror of true patriotism the incom parable Wallace, who acted for a while as go vernor of the realm, all the English clergy with in the diocese of St. Andrews were ejected, and natives put in their room. His successor Lam berton was at first in Edward's good graces, bu being suspected of favouring the Bruce's cause he was thrown into prison, where he lay till Ed ward's death. Robert Wishart Bishop of Glad gow, for his bold speech at Norham, and stead adherence to Bruce, was taken prisoner by Ed ward and fent up to London, where he was ker in confinement under very hard usage for man So was Marcus Bishop of the Isles, wh had been employed in many foreign negotiation and been Chancellor of the kingdom, but w d by Edward, for his love to his country, and LETTER ity to him whom he thought his lawful Prince. XXII. the other hand Bishop Cheyne of Aberdeen, g connected with the Cumines, who at that were the most powerful family in Scotland, were all enemies to Bruce, was forced to fly England when their affairs turned low, but permitted by Robert Bruce to return, and poshis see in peace. Thus were they divided heir centiments, and no inference with respect the merits of the cause can well be drawn from r conduct.

d this time the Pope was not idle. Applicas were made to him from both fides, and he knew how to manage all to his own ends. : Scots, being grievoully oppressed by Edward England, fent deputies to Rome, with instrucs to supplicate the Pope for relief, by means his interpolition: In which instructions they care to magnify the antiquity of their fettleit, and earliness of their conversion by the veable relics of St. Andrew, by which means church of Scotland, they fay, " became subect, without any intermediate metropolitan, to eter the Prince of the church, and to bleffed Andrew his brother." The Pope Boniface I. took hold of this supplication, and sent imliately to Edward, telling him that the fovemty of Scotland belonged to the church, and refore enjoined him to forbear further proding against that people. Our historian Bishop

It is reported, that on his return home, and out of joy he was received into the King's favour, he applied all the sof his fee, which during his absence had accresced to a secretable sum, towards building the stately bridge over the Don. (Bp. Keith's catalogue, p. 65.)

LETTER shop Leslie, to set off the Pope's authority XXII. more, tells us that "Edward, after much dai " done to us, being prohibited by Pope I " face from further distressing a nation w " had never been subject to any foreign K Hift. b. vi. " desisted from his fury." But the English p. 96. torians represent the matter otherwise. us that both Edward and his nobility were n disgusted at the Pope's message, and wrote l to him in vindication of Edward's claim, an befeech his Holiness not to meddle more in matter. When these letters came to Rome Collier. b. v. p.496. bearing a shew of argument in defence of ward's usurpation, they were answered by a confutation, which the Scotichronicon has ferved verbatim, under the title of "The pro-" of Baldred Biffet against the fictions of "King of England." But the Pope being 1. xi. c. 56. this time entangled in a contest with the I ad finem. of France, and not willing on that account to oblige the King of England also, dismissed Scottish commissioners, after a long and ex five stay at Rome, with great promises of far when he should see it convenient. However, withstanding of the Pope's coldness, and in of all opposition either from foreign force or mestic treachery, it pleased heaven at last to b Robert Bruce, now in the thirty fecond year his age, to the throne of his ancestors. in maintaining his title, for the first year or he was worsted in several skirmishes by the l lish party, and obliged to fly from place to p > to fave his life, yet by the divine bleffing u his own undaunted spirit, and the unwearied diness of his faithful friends, matters were by grees brought into such an appearance of se that in the year 1310, four years after his LETTER tion, a national council was held at Dun-XXII. which, among other acts, King Robert's to the crown is afferted by all the Bishops lergy of Scotland.

the nation was not fully in peace. The h, not willing to part with the possessions ad lately seized in Scotland, and being fretiee their King's honour thus sullied by t's successes, were still in arms and on the to disturb his reign, and tumble him, if e, from the throne. But all their attempts lighty boasts were blown into air by the rable battle of Bannockburn, where upon enty sisth of June 1314, Robert Bruce, at and of thirty thousand men, gave an entire to the English army of more than a hund-ousand, commanded by their King Edward person, who shamefully sled among the first, arrowly escaped falling into the victor's

This decifive blow fecured the indepenof Scotland, and fixed the crown without ore dispute upon Robert's head. And now ce of affairs was changed. The English, me years before had scornfully rejected the interpolition in behalf of the Scots, were lad to have recourse to him for themselves. ope immediately dispatched a Legate into nd with orders to the Scots "to defift from abling England, till he had heard the quefis in agitation between them, and been inned of the right which Edward claimed to superiority of Scotland." To this Robert red, "His Holiness could not be ignorant he state of the affair, which had been fully ared up by the Scottish commissioners at " Rome

LETTER "Rome some years before, and might remem XXII. " ber how faucily then the English had refuse " all reasonable offers of peace, so that now when " it had pleafed heaven to prosper the Scottill " arms in maintaining their just liberties, he mul " be excused to prosecute his advantage, and not " let the present favourable opportunity slip ou " of his hands." The Legate taking this answer as an unpardonable infult on his master's authority, put the kingdom under an interdict, and h departed.

give of this affair. But the English writers put another face on it. They tell us that the Pope excommunicated Robert for breaking his oath of homage to the King of England, and that in a fecond Bull he charged him, among other of fences, with tearing his letters and shewing dif respect to his nuncios, for which outrages he a gain orders him to be excommunicated forthwith One thing is certain, that neither the King nor the nation at this time paid any regard to the Pope's threats. For the King went on, in his own way, to diffress the English: And soon after A.D. 1320. the nobility wrote that famous letter to the Pope John XXII. in which they again affert their independence, from the old topic of their antiquity and priority of fettlement, when compared with the English, and boldly declare their resolution w adhere to their lawful King Robert against al opponents, at the same time begging to be restored to his Holiness's good graces, and promise ing all reasonable obedience to the Apostolic see This letter, we are told, was well received, as # contained fuch flattering professions of respect and fubmission to Rome, however bravely it disclaim-

April 6,

This is the account which our own historian

e least token of subjection to England. But, LETTER her owing to the Pope's mediation, or to the XXII. then state of affairs in England on the deon of Edward II. and succession of his son, was that a peace was made up, and the young of England solemnly and by a formal deed inced the unjust claim which his father and l-father had struggled so long to support. It country now began to feel the blessings of the peace and order both in church and state, forty years of sad tumult and confusion in

But this funshine did not continue long uned. For within two or three years King A.D. 1329 rt died, of a difease contracted by the inole fatigues and bodily hardships which he went in profecution of his title, in the fifth year of his age, and twenty third from ublic coronation, whose character Archbi-Spotswood has emphatically given in few i, that "he was a King of incomparable dom and valour, whose worth and virtue pen can express." And indeed his wisdom red in his very last moments, as in other ices of important advice, so especially in ly contriving to fend the brave Douglas f the country, on the honourable employof carrying the King's heart to the Holy , with a view to prevent any emulation bethat great man and Sir Thomas Randolph, the had appointed regent during his fon's ity.

ere is one thing in our public history conig him, which I cannot well account for.— always, in all catalogues of our Kings,
Robert the First, and it appears, as obby an English writer, from one of his pub-Nich. Scots

T t 2 lic Hift. Lib.

LETTER lic deeds in which he calls Alexander III. "O

XXII. " predecessor last deceased," that he did n reckon John Baliol among the Kings of Scotlan Now it is certain that, upon this principle, h grand-father Robert was the immediate heir t Alexander, and upon his death his fon Rober this Robert's father, succeeded to the title. Eve allowing Baliol to have been King, and, as i faid, to have forfeited his title by his ignomini ous subjection to Edward, yet both the elder Ro berts were alive at that time, and the young Ro bert could have no pretension to the crown while they lived. If it shall be said, that none of them could assume the title of King till they wer crowned, which none of them was but the youn Robert, this contradicts both present law and pre fent ptactice, which agree that, as the constitu tion admits of no vacancy of the throne, the li neal heir is King even before coronation; i which case this Robert would not be the fir but either the third or fecond, of the name. take notice of this, not with a view to discu the point, which is neither necessary nor easy but only to observe that there may have be variations in the constitution, and may be pect liarities in the regal fuccession which cannot be fully explained, nor altogether adjusted to a modern form. It has been faid too, that both the grand-father Robert, who was the original cor petitor, and his fon Robert, either dropped the title, or furrendered it to Edward, for which re fon it would feem they are excluded from the royal list. But if it was so, it would appear from what followed, that a tacit acquiescence, or eve an actual refignation, was not at that time reckor ed sufficient to foreclose the next heir's right n when it opened to him by the common LETTER of nature. I could not omit these obvious on this distinguished epocha of our hishich, whether we consider the importance intricate scene itself, or the striking merit apital actor in it, I believe no Scotsman en yet look back to, without bestowing loughts of admiration upon it. is King's time flourished our country-man ott of Dunse,* so famous a school-divine, renowned for his acuteness in disputation. Romish writers have dignified him with of Doctor Subtilis, the Subtile Doctor, and glish, on account of his fame, would have gainst all probability, to be a countryman There had been before him feveral of the name of Scott, well known in the world, especially John Scott Erigena in th century, and the accurate chronologer us Scotus in the twelfth, both of whom Ih, under pretence of their island being in ays called Scotia, and the people Scots, our to rob us of, and challenge as their lut this John Duns Scotus they pretend no , and leave that honour to be debated us by the English. Besides him, and : any dispute, our country produced a Datt in the time of our King David, who storiographer to the Emperor Henry V. ote the history of that Emperor's expedito Italy against Pope Paschal: and a Micott in the time of Alexander III. a curi-

taught at Oxford, Paris, and Cologne, and it is reat at Oxford, thirty thousand pupils attended his lec-

LETTER ous philosopher, and most expert in the math XXIL matical sciences, which in those days were loo ed upon by the vulgar to be no better than con juration and witchcraft, as was experienced to h cost by the English Franciscan Friar Roger B con, who was co-eval with our Michael.

> In this reign too there was a council held: Vienne in France for suppressing the Knight Templars. This order of military Monks ha been instituted about two hundred years before for defending the pilgrims who came to visit the holy places about Jerusalem, and had got land affigned them by the Pope and Princes for that fervice. But in process of time they had degene rated into luxury and debauchery, and were now suppressed by a Bull of Pope Clement V. with this remarkable and extravagant clause in it, "Altho' of right we cannot, yet by the fulness " of our power we do reprobate and condemn " the faid order." At this rate what may not a Pope, indeed what may not any person do? !! power of any kind may be exercised in opposition to right, the world must be at a miserable pass, and a robber or murderer may with equal confidence fay that, tho' by right he cannot, yet by the fulness of his power, he may take a purse or cut a throat. This distinction between right and power, which the Pope made use of at this time, and which has ferved his fuccessors on many other occasions, he could not fay was derived to him from St. Peter, neither could he plead any excuse for making use of it at all. men were really guilty of the blasphemy, sodomy, and other horrible enormities laid to their charge, it was right to condemn them, and abolish such a fraternity. If not, it was the height of injul

n the Pope to countenance the malice of LETTER enemies, and by such an iniquitous sentence way for their destruction. However, guilty ot, they were seized in every place where could be laid hands on, some of them burnt take, the order suppressed, and their large sions, which the temporal Princes had their upon, given away by the Pope to the Hospis, or Knights of St. John, who had begun the same time, and for much the same purand who, tho' long a numerous and powerody, are now reduced to the poor Island of 1, from which they have their present name sights of Malta.

I am, &c.

LETTER

LETTER XXIII.

LETTER XXIII.

Accession of David II.——Troubles of his Reign and State of the Church——He dies, and is succeeded by his Nephew Robert II.——Schism in the Papal See——Account of Wickliss—His Character and Writings.

A.D. 1330: A FTER the death of King Robert, David his fon by his fecond wife, fucceeded to the throne, and was folemnly crowned at Scoon. Tho' but eight years of age, he had been already married to the fifter of Edward the young King of England, but within a few years was obliged to leave Scotland, and retire with his Queen to France: For Edward, fon to John Baliol, in pursuance of his father's old claim, and affisted, contrary to the ties of honesty and alliance, by Edward III. of England, had invaded the kingdom, and by some means or other, got possession of the greatest part of it. On this, began another scene of disorder and devastation, productive of consequences which almost equalled

e calamities of former times. The nobility took LETTER fferent fides, and put one another to the fword XXIII. ithout mercy. The churchmen too were again vided in their attachments, and the Pope for ie most part took care to side with the victors. This contest however was not of long duraon. Edward Baliol had no more of the royal oirit than his father, and the King of England is great supporter, was as ambitious and ungeerous as his predecessors. The entire conquest f Scotland was what he aimed at, and Baliol's retended title was only the instrument he chose. work with. This in end opened the nation's yes, and united all parties in defence of their ountry and liberties. They faw that Baliol was nly a tool to English ambition, and they could ot but be aware of the consequences. So with lmost unanimous consent they called home the on and heir of their great deliverer, who landed ith his Queen at Innerbervy in the year 1342, her an exile of nine years, and was now reeived with universal congratulation.

Yet this joyful restoration did not produce an mmediate calm. Edward of England still kept p his defign of enflaving Scotland, and being low in the height of his glory, had in right of his nother, but contrary to the standing law of real succession in France, laid claim also to that ingdom. In profecution of this claim, his arnies were distressing France, and he and his son arrying all before them with fire and fword.— This engaged our King in the cause, both on acount of the old alliance between Scotland and France, and out of particular gratitude to an inwred Monarch, who had so generously entertain-A him in his distress. But in this noble de-Uu

LETTER sign he met with a fatal disappointment: For ex XXIII. tering England with an army, on purpose to tak off some part of the burden of the war from the French, he was attacked by a superior force near Durham, where his troops were routed and himself fighting manfully was taken prisoner, and carried to A. D.1346. London. Here he was detained eleven years, notwithstanding of the repeated proposals made by his subjects for his release: Till at last, by the Pope's mediation, the King of England agreed to take a hundred thousand merks for his ransom, but at the same time extorted from him a promise to do what he could to persuade the Scots to acknowledge the King of England as their superior Lord. After this fecond return, his reign was no further disturbed, but continued quiet and peaceable till his death, which happened in February 1370-1, in the forty ninth year of his age and forty first of his reign, nine of which he had spent in exile, and eleven in confinement: "A man," fays Buchanan, "famous for every " species of virtue, especially for justice and cle-" mency; and one whose vicissitudes in life were " more owing to misfortune than to want of " forefight."

The confusions of the kingdom in his time, and the fluctuating state of affairs under the two claimants, furnish but few materials for our present purpose. At this period the history of the Church is very lame and imperfect both at home and abroad. Almost the whole christian world was involved in troubles and commotions. The Turks had now for the first time broke into Greece under Amurath their third Sultan, and grandso to their famous Ottoman. The Eastern Empire watern by intestine divisions, and finking apace interpretations.

hat miserable servitude under which it has so LETTER Germany was all in confusion XXIII. ong groaned. about the election of its Emperors, which had been for many years a fource of contention among the Princes of the empire, and continued fo till Charles IV. established some kind of form and order by the publication of his Golden Bull in the year 1356. The Popes were busied in humbling the Italian Princes, and the English were ravaging France. At home, as I said, our Bishops differed in politicks, tho' they agreed in doctrine, Some of them adhered steadily to David Bruce, and suffered in his cause: Others followed young Baliol ill they faw him ferving the English interest, and then left him. The episcopal succession was still continued: And when a vacancy happened, the lee was filled either by the Pope, from the plenitude of his power which was now in its meridian, or by the election of the chapter, sometimes with, and sometimes without the King of England's recommendation.

After David's return from France, the Bishops been to have been united in their attachment to him, and during the eleven years of his captivity, we find no difference of political principles among In the negotiations for his liberation they ill gave their hearty concurrence, and many of hem were personally employed in effecting it. There were indeed altercations fometimes about their elections between the King and the Pope, out they were not carried to fuch heights as had Deen seen in former times. The King was a quiet well disposed man, and it would seem the Popes le had to do with, were more fo than some of heir predecessors had been. For towards the payng of his ransom the Pope consented to the cler-Ù u 2

LETTER gy's giving the tenth of their benefices for three XXIII. years. This was certainly a handsome instance of duty and affection to their Sovereign, if it had not been clogged with the Pope's permission, which was unnecessary to be asked, and supersluous in the giving. For could not the clergy contribute, and for fuch a purpose too, any portion they pleased of their yearly livings which had been bestowed upon them by their King's progenitors, without waiting for leave from one, to whom, however much they might think themselves depending on him in spirituals, they surely owed no part of their temporal subsistence? But it was by these little instances of generosity on the one side, where it cost nothing, and by repeated concessions and compliments on the other for the fake of peace, that the Roman Pontiff not only supported his authority, but even enlarged it to that degree, that 2 clergyman could not dispose of his own money, tho' for the King's fervice, without first consulting the Pope about it.

However the contribution in the present case was both dutiful and seasonable: And in return for this liberality, it was granted either by this King or his successor, at the instance of Bishop Landals of St. Andrews, who had been very active in the King's affairs, that the Bishops should be allowed to dispose of their private goods by testament, or if they died intestate, that their nearest of kin should call for and take possession of them; whereas before this, it had been customary for the King's officers, on a Bishop's death, to seize all his moveable effects and carry them off to the King's use. In this King's minority, the town all his moveable effects and carry them off to the AD. 1333. King's use. In this King's minority the town of Aberdeen was burnt by the English, with the lodgings of the Canons and the Bishop's palace, which,

1, it was thought, was the cause of the Bi-LETTER Alexander Kininmont's death. In his time XXIII. ohn Pilmore Bishop of Moray finished the h college at Paris, which had been begun by redecessor David Murray in the year 1325. vas always managed, till the reformation, by uthority of the Bishops of Moray, who, in y of founders and patrons, presented to the and fettled directors and funeriors in it. the death of David Bruce without issue, eccession fell to his nephew Robert Stuart, son alter great Steward of Scotland, by Marjory daughter to Robert Bruce by his first wife. Prince was then in the fifty seventh year of ge, was the father of a numerous family, and een concerned in the publick management civil and military, before his accession to the nment in his own person. He is called rt the second, and was the first of the noble of Stuart who swayed the Scottish Sceptre, ived to him in right of blood from his heroic father Robert Bruce, and from him conveyed eight fuccessive generations of the name to s VI. in whose person the two crowns of ind and England were at last happily united. church annals of this Robert's reign, are ren as those of his predecessors. We hear councils either at home or abroad which re-I the attendance of our Prelates; so their employment was to enlarge and adorn their irals and palaces, to make charitable donaand when called upon, to manage the affairs te in those departments to which the King nted them. In these, we are told, they bewith univerfal approbation, and gained the and esteem of both King and subject: Especially

EFTER Especially Walter Traill Bishop of St. Andr. XXIII. of whom, on his promotion to that see while he attending Pope Clement VII. at Avignon, the I gave this character; "this man deserveth be to be Pope than Bishop; the place is better vided than the person."

This Clement is looked upon by the pre Romanists to have been but an Antipope, se by a party in the conclave in opposition to Ur VI. from whom the church of Rome recl the fuccession. This was the beginning of long schism which made such a noise in the chu and had its foundation entirely in wordly confid tions. Pope Clement V. many years before being at variance with the Emperor, and not: to carry his point against him, retired for pro tion to the King of France, Philip the Fair, got a residence from him in the city of Avig where he fixed the papal chair, and where it tinued for upwards of seventy years, thro' undisputed successions. But now on the deat Gregory XI. in the year 1378, the Italian dinals, who had long grudged the diminutio their antient splendor by the removal of the Po court, chose Urban on condition of his bring back the court to Rome, which he accordi On the other hand, the French part the Cardinals, with the same views of honour interest, gave their voices for Clement, who tinued still at Avignon, and thundered out Bulls against Urban, who paid him back in own coin. The church of England acknowled Urban, and our church it feems owned his c The effects of this competition we have occasion to consider afterwards.

During the whole of this King's reign there fort of war kept up between the Scots and LETTER h, with various fuccess. The King himself XXIII. not appear in the field on account of his ut he was served by brave and prudent of-

In the Church all was quiet and peace-except what disturbances were for some raised by the King's third son Alexander, only called the Wolf of Badenach, who hathe churchmen in the northern parts, and ularly threatened to murder the worthy Bi-Cuningham of Aberdeen: But by the Bi-wise management, and the interposition of ing's authority, the attempt was frustrated, llexander restrained from surther opportunimischief.

England the affairs of the church were in ter ferment: For now the tenets of the fa-John Wickliff began to make a noise. was rector of Lutterworth in the diocese of In, and maintained, "That the Pope was not head of the church: That the Eucharist afconfectation was not the true body of Christ, only an emblem or fign of it: That the pel is a sufficient rule of life to every chris-, and therefore every supplemental instituof Monkery and the like is entirely superus: That the Pope and other Prelates ought to exercise corporal displine upon offenders: id that churchmen might be dispossessed of r revenues in case of misbehaviour." These ons, fo contrary to the current doctrine of the , and fo dangerous to the papal power, foon ed the then Pope Gregory XI. who immey dispatched an order to the Archbishop of rbury to apprehend Wickliff and bring him unishment for such bold affertions. Wick-

LETTER Wickliff was supported by some persons of po-XXIII. and influence, especially by the Duke of Lancal King Richard's uncle, and notwithstanding of frequent fynods convened against him, where qualified and explained the propositions, but ne absolutely retracted them, he continued ma years in full possession of his office and livi Yea, which is indeed worthy of notice, his monstrances against the church of that age, or not carry him so far as to quit her communio For as he was faying mass in his parish chu upon Innocent's day, he was feized with a of the palfy, which cut him off a few days He was a man of untainted character a strict regularity of life, and however displeasing his doctrine, was unexceptionable in his more Even his great adversary Waldensis, Prior Gerral of the Carmelites in England, who wrote purpose against him, and has represented his ten in the blackest light he could, yet acknowledges vast capacity and deep penetration. His enem have attemped to charge him with having fome ed the popular infurrections of those days, whi gave the government fo much uneafiness, and c Simon Sudbury, Archbishop of Canterbury But, besides that none of the princileaders in these commotions, either in their put declarations while fuccessful, or at their tri after all was over, ever mention Wickliff as ing any way aiding or affifting to them, it is strong presumption in his favour, that his gr supporter the old Duke of Lancaster was a partilar object of the rebels fury, and if he had come is their hands, would have fallen a facrifice to the refentment. Wickliff wrote a great many boo and among other performances, translated

Вı

Bible into English, for which the writers of those LETTER days are highly displeased with him. He had several adherents in his life, and a number of sollowers after his death, who added to his doctrines, and by these corrupt additions brought that disrepute upon them, which they have so generally lien under ever since. We shall soon hear more of this man: But I have taken this notice of him now, because he was cotemporary with our King Robert II. and tho' not belonging to our church, came in process of time to be much spoken of in it, upon many interesting accounts. I am, &c.

X x LETTER

XXIV.

L E T T E R XXIV.

Peaccable Accession of John, by the Name of Rebert III.—Revolution in England—Conduction of the Pope on this Occasion—Quiet State of Things in Scotland—Character and Death of Robert III.

A.D. 1390: FTER a reign of nineteen years, Robert I died, and has met with the universal a probation of all our historians, for his exact ad ministration of justice, and settling the gover ment, by rules of the most consummate equity an prudence. He was succeeded by his eldest so John, who disliking that name, perhaps on a count of the bad fortune that had attended Joh of England, and John Baliol in Scotland, chol rather to be called by his father's, as more at fpicious, and stands in the list of our Kings b the name of Robert the Third. This is he whom Buchanan, and his modern followers, wh bear no good will to the Stuart family, copying after the incorrect account of former writers, have thought proper to stigmatize as a bastard. Fo they tell us that his father, when but a young LETTER man, in his uncle David Bruce's time, kept a XXIV. concubine Elizabeth Mure, by whom he had three fons, this John, Robert, and Alexander: That he afterwards married Eupham daughter to the Earl of Ross, by whom he had two sons, Walter and David: And that when he came to the crown. on Queen Eupham's death foon after, he formally married his old concubine, with a view to legitimate his issue by her, and bring them into the fuccession. But this confused and scandalous story has been folidly confuted of late, by a number of able writers, from this, among many other conclusive arguments, that in David Bruce's time, this John is frequently in public deeds designed "eldest son and heir to Robert the Great "Steward of Scotland," and in that character, as heir to the apparent heir of the kingdom, stands at the head of the hostages sent into England in the year 1357, for the redemption of the King. At that time therefore he was publicly acknowledged as a lawful eldest son, and now, as a lawful eldest son, upon his father's death, he obtained the crown by hereditary right.

But here it may be proper to take notice that, while in Scotland the son was peaceably ascending the father's throne, without any contention, England was laying schemes for tumbling the lineal heir from the throne which he had been twenty two years in possession of, and filling it with an usurping collateral. For in this King Robert's reign, the unfortunate Richard II. son and heir to the great favourite of the English nation, the Black Prince, was dethroned and basely murdered by the ambition of his cousin the Duke of Lancaster, who seized the crown and wore it X x 2

LETTER by the name of Henry IV. This unnatural XXIV. volution was principally effected by the inter and intrigues of Arundel Archbishop of Cant bury, who had been convicted of high treat and banished art of the kingdom a few yet before. In this exile he was supported by the R man Pope Boniface IX. who besides other presents, promoted him as we are told to the set collist. St. Andrews in Scotland: Which, if not a man birt p.602 take in the historian, was a most flagrant injuries in the Percet For at this time the form

tice in the Pope: For at this time the fee we filled with the worthy Bishop Traill, who furvive the English revolution some years.

But this is not the only instance of the Pope

forwardness in complimenting his favourites wi vain titles. For about eleven years before th on Nevil Archbishop of York being found gui of treason and obliged to fly for his life, Po Urban VI. gave him the Bishoprick of St. A drews to support him in his banishment. But, Mr. Collier tells the story, the Scots being the interest of Clement, Urban's competitor, wor not receive Nevil, but adhered to Bishop Tr whom Clement had preferred. Now, if these t ftories be true, which they may be, tho' our or writers take no notice of them, it would feem the the Popes at Rome did not acknowledge the lidity of Bishop Traill's ordination by the Pope Avignon, and likewise that our national chu thought herself at liberty, when there was a co petition for the papacy, to determine for her which of the competitors to acknowledge. P haps the truth is, that the Popes did not mu study what was regular in these cases, but with regard to Canons or order, feized every oppor nity of exerting their paramount power, to gra y their friends, or please the prevailing party - LETTER An instance of which we have in this very affair XXIV. of Arandel. For tho', by bestowing on him the fee of St. Andrews, it would appear that the Pope thought him ill-used by King Richard; yet on Richard's writing a sharp letter of expostulation and complaint, he promoted Roger Walden to the fee of Canterbury, who accordingly was installed, and performed all the Archiepiscopal functions, by holding fynods, and making provincial constitu-But no fooner was the tide turned against Richard, and Arundel returned to England in triumph on Henry's successful usurpation, but the fame Pope discharges Arundel from any engagement to St. Andrews, revokes Walden's Bull of promotion, and restores Arundel to his old see. And thus, fays my author, "by the prevarica-"tions of the court of Rome, which moved with " the revolutions in the state, Arundel both lost " and recovered his Archbishoprick."*

Collier, b.vil.p.609

Another specimen of the Pope's readiness to comply with the times, we have in his behaviour to Thomas Merks Bishop of Carlisle, the only one of all the English Bishops who made any appearance in defence of his injured Sovereign. This man, when the question was put in the House of Peers how to dispole of Richard's person, had the courage to make a speech against the illegality and iniquity of such proceedings: Which speech Mr. Collier has preserved to us, and which, for the warmness of affection, and strength of argument contained in it, will carry down the speaker's memory to posterity with veneration. For this speech the honest Bishop was immediately arrefted and committed to prison, from whence being set at liberty, and joining in an unfuccessful attempt to save Richard's life, he was tried for it, and found guilty. However Henry, out of regard to either his character or constancy, spared his life, and the Pope, to ease Henry of such an uncomplying churchman, forced him to quit the fee of Carlifle, and accept of the Bishoprick of Samo in the Island of Cephalonia. But

LETTER

Perhaps it may be thought that the Pope no

XXIV. doubt had a particular reason for his unkindness te-Richard and his adherents. In the fixteenth year of Richard II. an act had passed extending as well as confirming, the statue of pramunire the twenty feventh of Edward III. which was fue a check on the pretentions of the Popes as they would be fure to feek revenge for, however foon they had it in their power. But Edward III. was too high-spirited a Prince to meddle with. His grandson Richard, being but twelve years of age when he came to the throne, besides his not inheriting the magnanimity of either his father or grandfather, was continually disturbed in his government either by popular insurrections, or the ambition of his numerous relations: So was an easier subject to contend with, when a convenient opportunity offered: And the Pope would be ready enough to catch at every thing he could make a handle of to gratify his refentment. It may therefore be reasonably presumed that Richard's opposition to the Papal encroachments contributed as much to his misfortunes, as his cou-probability have been so successful as it was.*

the good man died in a short time, probably from grief and illusage, and so escaped the rigours of the revolution. From this piece of English history we may observe how careful the Roman Pontists were to improve every occurrence to their temporal advantage, whatever should become of the spiritual interests of the church, or the moral concerns of truth and equity.

fin's ambition, which without Arundel's affistance, and the Pope's countenance, would not in all

* This may be thought an ill-natured reflection on the Pope's character: But his glaring partiality to Arundel who was Richard's bitter enemy, and his carelessiness about the Bishop of Carlise who was his only friend, give too much foundation for it. In our nation, all this time matters were going LETTER n a fmooth uniform way both in church and XXIV.

Our clergy indeed owned the fuccession ie French Popes, as they were called: But they might not be too much embroiled in consequences of the schism while it lasted, had recourse to the privilege formerly grantnem by a Papal Ball, of chusing a Conservator , which was now confirmed and enforced i act of the civil power, to be seen among tatutes of Robert III. As to state-affairs it is hy of observation, that while in England from iam the Norman's time, there had been fret changes and interruptions in the lineal e, by the accession of Henry I. against his brother Robert, the usurpation of Stephen Henry's daughter Maud, the fuccession of in prejudice of his nephew Arthur, the d refignation of Edward II. to his fon Ed-III. and now the deposing of Richard II. ike room for the Duke of Lancaster who was he lineal heir (in all which cases the Bishops gone backward and forward, and the Popes peen still on the prevailing side,) our nation hitherto seen no such changes, nor under-such disagreeable convulsions. For, excepthe dispute between Bruce and Baliol which, the unprecedented nature of it, was an intripoint of law, and made more fo by the ine and ambition of the three Edwards of and, from the time of Malcolm Canmore,

1 a behaviour cannot well be accounted for, without supfome plot of importance to be carrying on all the time. er the English history in after ages has produced any pao this revolution, may be left to every reader to determine sfelf, as either candour or prejudice may be predominant.

I.ETTER which coincided with the Norman Æra, XXIV. next heir to the Scotish crown had peaced and regularly, whether in or out of minoriascended the throne of his ancestors, with any rivalship from the nobility on the one side, much consusion to the churchmen on the other.

The quiet reign of this second Scottish Ki of the Stuart family, affords not many men rable incidents in the history of our church Every thing in it, as well as in the state, see to have been managed equitably and orderly, the mutual fatisfaction of both king and peop At last the good old King was brought to gr trouble by a scene of family distress, which, is faid, hastened him to the grave. His eldest David, it feems, was a wild ungovernable your And his father having committed the managem of him to his brother the Duke of Albany, wh he had made governor of the kingdom, the happy Prince was shut up in the castle of F2 land, where in a short time he was starved death. His father, on hearing this melanch news, and fearing the worst for his next and r only fon James, took the resolution to fend I to France for his fafety. But the ship being stress of weather driven upon the English co or, as some fay, putting in designedly to reli the Prince from a severe fit of sea-sickness, was detained with all his retinue, and fent u London to the then King Henry IV. who w nerously kept him prisoner, notwithstanding c most moving letter which King Robert had w ten with his own hand to Henry, and fent al with the Prince, in case of any such accide happening. This was a most shameful act barbarity, and fuch an open violation of all nciples of humanity and compassion, as the LETTER iglish historians themselves do not take upon XXIV. em sully to vindicate.

It is but a poor apology which is generally ofred for Henry's conduct, that James got a genel and princely education in England, and ereby imbibed all those noble qualities which ade his reign afterwards fo conspicuous. those improvements might have been as much ving to his own natural capacity, as to the care hich the English bestowed upon him. od effects of a foreign education he might have stained, as well at his liberty in France, as unr restraint in England; unless it shall be said, at the best way to educate a King is to make m a prisoner. Be in this what may, it was a we unworthy action, and proved fatal to the od old King his father. For being told of it supper, he fainted, and died of grief the third ly after, at his palace of Rothfay in Bute, in the ar 1406, having reigned fixteen years: A man ho, however unfit he is commonly represented have been for kingly government, is univerfally mmended for piety towards God, for charity the poor, for strict honesty in all his dealings, a word, for every virtue that adorns private life. ad even the opinion of his unfitness for governent, which all our historians agree in, seems have been taken up without fufficient ground. is committing so great a share of the management lastairs to his brother the Duke of Albany, was aly continuing him in the trust and office to which reir father had promoted him, and may be as just-I supposed a singular instance of considence in a rother, and reverence to a father's memory, as Υv

LETTER of indolence and want of capacity in himself. XXIV. On the whole, I see no reason why this unhappy Monarch, who has been unjustly branded with the illegitimacy of his birth, should likewife be fpoken of in fuch a contemptible way by writers of all denominations, as being in John Major's stile, "bonus vir, sed parum bonus Rex, a good " man, but not a good King," or as Buchanan "describes him, "rather without any vice than "illustrious for any virtue;" tho' they all agree that he was remarkable for the most unblemised regularity of life, and for stateliness of person inferior to none of his time.

I am &c.

* An English writer presents us with an anecdote of this Nich. Scots King, which he had met with in a manuscript collection of p. 154,125. poems in an English gentleman's library, and which if genuise, displays his character, even for martial bravery, in a more advatageous light than our professed historians have drawn it is. It is from a manuscript account written by a Dean David Steill, of Robert the third's contest with Henry the fourth of England, about the old demand of homage, in which after the usual boals of Brutus on the one side, and Scota on the other, Robert propoles to decide the controverly by fixty against fixty of the royal blood of both kingdoms, forty against forty, twenty against twenty, "or if Henry approves it, that the two Kings themselves may end a by single combat." This shews what opinion this writer, who by his language scems to have been a cotemporary, entertained of King Robert's courage, and the more so, as at the time of this challenge Robert was above fixty years of age, and Henry below forty.

XXV.

L E T T E R XXV.

gency of the Duke of Albany—Burning of Heretics begun—The Practice brought from England into Scotland—Continuance of the Papal Schifm—University of St. Andrews founded by Bishop Wardlaw—Council of Constance condemns John Huss—Takes the Eucharistic Cup from the Laity—Deposes the three rival Popes, and elects another—The Scottish Church at last acknowledges the new Pope—And holds a national Council by her own Authority.

JN the death of Robert III. and captivity of A. D. 14:6. James his fon and fucceffor, the administrance of affairs was continued with the Duke of bany, till means should be taken for the young ng's release, which tho' often attempted, in the y of negotiation, was not effected till eighteen are after. In the second year of the Duke of Alay's government, our histories present us with new mode of ecclesiastical censure, which bear now to be much practised, as an effectual Y y 2 me-

LETTER method to support the huge fabrick of Papal and

XXV. thority. I. have already mentioned how one Wickliff in England had publicly vented some tenets contrary to the received doctrines of thele times, and what pains the church there had taken to filence him, and stop the progress of his opinions. Yet these opinions spread, and his disciples carried them into other countries. Accordingly they were about this time brought into Scotland by one of his scholars, John or James Schotichr.

Resby an English Priest, who, says my author, 1. xv. c. 20. was reckoned a famous preacher by the simple people, but interspersed many dangerous conclufions in his discourses, especially these two capital ones, "That the Pope is not in fact Christ's "vicar; and that none can be Christ's vicar is he be a wicked man." For this unpardonable boldness he was summoned before Mr. Laurence Lindores, the appointed inquisitor of heresy, and being convicted, was given over to the fecular arm, and publicly burnt at a stake. Let us see how the historian, who was cotemporary with Refby, argues against these positions, "What, he " fays, can be more heretical than to fay that the "Pope is not Christ's vicar, as it is clear and "certain that some one must in fact be so, other-"wife the church would want a ministerial head: "But fuch an one is the Pope: ergo, by conver-"fion, the Pope is in fact Christ's vicar." This is the Abbot's syllogism, of which the least smatterer in logic cannot but fee the fallacy, both in the matter and manner of it. However, weak as it was in itself, yet when backed with fire and faggot, as at this time it began to be, it was unaniwerable, and poor Resby suffered under it.

This and another instance of the same kind lie

y on the memory of the then Bishop of St. LETTER lrews, Henry Wardlaw, who, Spotswood fays, XXV. otherwise a praise-worthy man, but by his e, had a principal hand in this fentence. No bt the Romanists, who glory in these fiery arients, will add this to his other meritorious ons, and applaud him for it. But whatever fe be due to it, he was not the first who inuced the practice into Britain, having only wed the example fet him in England. n years before this, one William Sawtry, anoscholar of Wickliff's and a Priest too, was ight before Arundel of Canterbury for being ollard, which was the ignominious nickname given to these people, and being by him conmed, was delivered over and burnt. This man, ar as appears, was the first who ever suffered England in this fevere manner for what was ed Herefy. But their new King Henry, to iniate himself with the clergy, had, immediately n his feizing the crown, passed a burning act inst the Lollards; and hence it has been, not roperly, observed that the practice of burning. etics was first made law of in England by a dy usurper. To evade the saturical force of observation, it is pled that burning had always a the punishment of Heresy by the Common But in return to this evasion, two questions ur. 1. When began the custom of capitally ishing heretics in any manner? It could not a primitive cultom, before christians had the ntenance of the temporal judges; and even afthey got this countenance, we are fure the It respectable names in the church did not The well known story of St. Amle of Milan and Martin of Tours refusing to LETTER communicate with Ithacius and some other XXV. shops who had persecuted the Priscillianist h tics to the death; and the great St. August behaviour in the long dispute with the Donat are a clear proof of this. It signifies little the spiritual courts, as Baronius pleads for th throw in a faving clause, as they call it, when t deliver over the poor culprit: For this is but pocritical grimace at best, as they know that their fentence the temporal court is obliged law to proceed to execution; and we feldon ever, read of any criminal escaping upon s recommendation, which would undoubtedly the case sometimes, as has been known in t poral judicatures, if it were a real, sincere de in the clergy, and not a matter of mere. a formality. But 2. granting that heretics, as ft ought to be capitally punished, it remains to asked, When or whence the barbarous practice burning them began, or in other words, fi what fource that practice, which I take to be foundation of what is called common law, derived? And this question naturally offers our view, by way of answer, the example of old heathen perfecutors, who among other bolical inventions of cruelty, brought in this of burning, to give them an opportunity of fe ing their eyes with the torments of the chris heretics (as they reckoned them) of those days So if the modern Roman church shall think to build on the model of the old Roman st and they have nothing else to build upon their burning people by common law, it is fair to let them enjoy all the glory that the i tation of fuch a pattern deserves.

If it was common law before, it became I statute law, at least in England; and what in LETTER former times the fecular judges might comply XXV. with or not, as precedent directed, was now bound down upon them by express statute. But this was not the only stretch of extraordinary power in this English King. For as with the one hand he held out this terrible act, to gratify the pasfions of some churchmen, so with the other he bore heavy on the pretended privileges of the whole order. In the fixth year of his reign, the Archbishop Scroop of York joined with some of the nobility in a combination against Henry, under pretext of his having broke the oath which he had fworn to the Archbishop, not to do any thing against King Richard, and at the same time with a view to restore the right line of the elder branch of the royal family. But the Archbishop being betrayed and arrested by the Earl of Westmorland, was condemned by Henry's positive order, and beheaded the next day, "the first Eng-" hish Bishop, says Mr. Collier, who had ever suf-"fered by a sentence of the King's judges."— And thus as Henry was the first who had the honour of bringing heretics to the stake by law, so he was the first who had the courage to bring Archbishop, and him too a man of noble birth and unblemished reputation, to the scaffold by his own arbitrary command, without trial by his peers, or any other formality of law whatever.

That such doctrines should have now prevailed in the church, and fuch liberties have been taken by the state, as had been unknown in some of the past ages, can be accounted for no other way, but by attributing it to the schism which had been so long kept up in the Romish church; two Popes, and fometimes three, warring against LETTER one another, and each of them disanulling his com-XXV. petitor's ordinances by opposite bulls and counter-fulminations. This it was that gave them work enough to defend themselves; so that whereas, when there was but one Pope peaceably settled in the chair at Rome, he had leisure to look about him, and to lay his rod of command with all it's weight upon any Prince or Prelate whom he thought too refractory, these rival Popes durst not meddle so far, even within what was called their own obedience, for fear of offending the vassals, whom they held now only by courtefy, and provoking them to go over to the opposite party. And amidst such indecent brawling and continued competitions for Headship, it was not to be wondered at, if some of the clergy, who had not much to lofe, and confequently had more courage than caution, should fpeak out, what others perhaps thought, that fuch opposite pretenders could not both of them be Heads of the church and vicars of Christ upon earth. From which well founded argument they might proceed to another rational enough conclusion, that under the risk of such uncertainty there seemed to be no necessity for any head of the church at all but Christ himself, nor for any one Bishop to be his vicar upon earth, more than another, and that therefore no Bishop, not even he of Rome, who had confined the once common designation of Pope to himself, had a divine right to that exclusive title.

> It would feem that the Cardinals, who had been long in possession of the privilege of chuling the Pope, had seen the bad consequences both in temporals and spirituals of this unnatural For on the death of Innocent VII: division. feveral veral of them entered into an agreement, and LETTER rore to it, that if any of themselves should be XXV. whom foever the election should ill, he should renounce the Papacy in case the ntipope did the fame, that upon fuch renunation the Cardinals on both fides might join gether, and proceed to a fingle election. Jpon this they elected Angelo Corario Cardinal fSt. Mark, who immediately took the name of bregory XII. and entered into the engagement But this healing nd oath above mentioned. verture availed nothing: For neither Gregory or his rival Benedict would yield, but went on ith their hostilities as fiercely as ever. In this ontention England fided with Gregory, Scotand with Benedict, and France stood neuter. in the Cardinals thought proper to call a fort f General Council, which was held in the year 409 at Pisa in Italy, where assembled twenty wo Cardinals, four Patriarchs, twelve Archbihops present, and fourteen Proxies, eighty Bihops in person, besides Proxies, eighty seven Abbots, with the Embassadors of Princes, and leputies from the most celebrated universities and cathedral churches. Here, after many fessions about the business, the council deposed both Gregory and Benedict, as notorious incorrigible chismatics and heretics, and guilty of plain erjury. Then the Cardinals present unanimousy elected the Cardinal of Milan, who took the ume of Alexander V. presided in the council, und incorporated the two divisions of Cardinals nto one college. Yet this judicial decision, intead of mending matters, made them much worse. For now in place of two, there were three conending Popes, all of them equally fierce and $\mathbf{Z} \cdot \mathbf{z}$

LETTER tenacious, and neither of them in the least XXV. clined to put an end to the rupture, or do a thing towards public peace. However the n Pope Alexander did not long enjoy his contel dignity: For he died the next year, and chair was immediately filled with Balthazar C who took the name of John XXIII. So the of fusion continued, and the church was at a to know, to which of the three she owed obt was deformed by these divisions, and the me bers distressed, and, as it were, torn asunder three contending heads, our church had happiness of seeing encouragement given home to learning and the liberal sciences. in the year 1412 Bishop Wardlaw founded university of St. Andrews, upon the model that of Paris, and brought to it from all p of the kingdom, Professor of the several branc of theology, philosophy, logic and rhetoric, v at first had no falaries, but willingly emplo their labours gratis to promote such a use design. And here I cannot but join with Jo Jo. Major, Major in being surprized at the inattention b. 6. c. 10. our Scottish Prelates, who had never thought fuch an undertaking before. Our country not been destitute of capable men; and ot nations had been the better of them. misfortunes of the times, and the impositi of the Popes had, it feems, fo harassed country in former ages, that the Bishops ! not leisure to form such beneficial plans. deed their necessary attendance on the publ fervice, and their forced obedience to the peated, and oft times contradictory, manda

While thus the outward face of the chu

of the court of Rome, engrossed the most of LETTER their attention, and prevented their turning their XXV. thoughts to their own national and more immediate concerns. However this was a laudable beginning, and Bishop Wardlaw has the honour of paving the way for subsequent foundations of the like kind.

All this time the Papal Schifm continued. The council of Pisa had indeed deposed Benedict and Gregory: But they both denied the deposing power; and how was the question to be decided? The court of Rome to this day rejects that doctrine, and will not allow that even a general council can depose the Pope. And upon the general principles of their church. they feem to argue right. For how can a body cut off its head and fet up another? Gregory XII. they must own, had been regularly chosen, and tho the council of Pifa had charged him with fallifying his oath by not renouncing the papacy, yet he could plead that his oath was only conditional, in case of Benedict's doing to too, and confequently not binding when that condition was not fulfilled. Thus each of the three had fomething to fay, if not for themselves, yet against their competitors. kept his court at Rome, Gregory at Rimini, and Benedict at Avignon, which Clement VI. had bought from the King of France for his luccessors use.

To remedy these disorders, if possible, the Emperor Sigismund, who countenanced the residenter at Rome, prevailed with John, partly by persuasion, partly by threats, to call a council. Which accordingly he did, and appointed it to meet at Constance in Germany in the Z z 2 month

LETTER month of December 1414. This was a nu-XXV. merous convention, and fat a long time. Delegates were fent to it from all the nations of of the three obediences, and they put a great deal of business thro' their hands. John was the only one of the three Popes who appeared at it, and for fome fessions was allowed the honour to prefide in it, till finding how matters were like to go, he threw off his pontifical habit, and fled out of Constance in disguise. But not being in a condition to dispute the council's proceedings, he submitted to their discipline, confirmed their fentences, and refigned the chair. In the eighth fession, the council after examination condemned Wickliff's doctrines, stigmatized his memory, and ordered his bones, if they could be distinguished, to be taken up and burnt. This was at best but a pitiful revenge, and shews to what lengths of ill-nature superstition will go. It is true, these doctrines gave great offence, both from the nature of them, and the reception they were now meeting with. They had been carried into Bohemia by a gentleman of that country, who had studied at Oxford in Wickliff's time: and some years after, one Peter Paine an Englishman went over to Bohemia with Wickliff's writings, and made

Among others who espoused these tenets, was John Huss, a Bohemian divine, and a man of great character for learning and probity. He was Principal of the college of Prague, and much esteemed by Wenceslaus King of Bohemia, who was the Emperor's elder brother. But being suspected of favouring Wickliss and opposing a great number of converts there to his per-

fuation.

opposing transubstantiation, he was summoned LETTER to the council, and came to it under the pro- XXV. tection of a folemn Safe-conduct from the Emperor, which Wenceslaus insisted on, both for his going and returning, before he would fend him. Here he was again and again examined upon the condemned articles, and numbers of captious and enfnaring questions were put to him; all which he answered in the scholastic style, so as neither to deny his doctrines in the main, nor yet lay himself open to a plain and direct conviction of herefy, notwithstanding of the cunning attempts made by the Cardinal of Cambray, who now presided in the council, to entrap him by metaphyfical distinctions and subtilties of Aristotle. Yet as Huss was a man of some eminence, and his abilities dangerous, he was found guilty by the council, and according to form delivered over to the secular arm: Upon which he was degraded, and by the express sentence of the very man who had given him his protection, publickly burnt at a stake. This affair made a great noise at the time, and has been much talked of ever fince. The council of Constance has been much inveighed against on this score by one class of writers, and as strenuously defended by another. But, not to enter into the merits of the cause, there was certainly breach of faith in it some-where or other, and if the blame of it shall be taken off from the council, it must ly upon the Emperor, tho' even in this case the council will not be found altogether faultless. For allowing them the full and entire privilege of proceeding against Huss as a heretic, and finding him, upon their conviction, liable to the sentence of the law, they ought, in the character

LETTER character of clergymen and spiritual guides, to XXV. have put the Emperor in mind of the necessity of keeping his promife to the man; and to have publickly expressed their disapprobation of his perfidy, when he broke it. Instead of which, in their nineteenth fession, they publish a falvo for the Emperor's conscience, as well knowing it much needed one, by emitting this sturdy declaration, "That the Prince who has " granted the Safe-conduct, provided he has done "his part, is no farther obliged by his pro-" mise." How far this removes the imputation I shall not fay: Only with respect to those who attempt to vindicate the burning of Huss as being no breach of faith, but quite fair and confistent with moral honesty, it may warrantably be faid, that these vindicators give their adverfaries fair warning not to trust to safe-conducts, or promises of any kind, when such interpreters as they have the management.

But it was not in his person only that John Huss was injured. His character also has suffered by misrepresentation of his doctrines, not only in the article of the Eucharist, in which he seems to have been orthodox enough, tho' he could not go the length of all the metaphysical niceties required of him, but also in another position ascribed to him, "That no Prince or Magistrate has "title to civil jurisdiction, while under the guilt " of mortal fin, that is, if he be a wicked man." But those who accuse the followers of Wickliss of this unjustifiable doctrine, forget that, the' they had really maintained fo, yet the doctrine is not peculiar to them, nor a novelty in itself. Pope Gregory VII. in his scandalous disputes with the Emperor had advanced this maxim, "That the east christian who is virtuous is more truly a LETTER King than a King who is wicked, because fuch XXV. a person is no longer a King but a tyrant." id before him, Pope Nicholas I. in an offil letter to Adventius Bishop of Metz about eying Kings, has these words, "You say you fubmit yourfelf to the King, because the scripture enjoins you, and you are in the right: But take care that Kings and Princes be truly fo: Look first how they govern themselves, and then how they govern their subjects: See if they be good Princes: Otherwise you ought to hold them for tyrants, and to refift them instead of submitting to them." What stronger ings have Wickliff or Huss faid, admitting the orst sense that can be put upon their expressiis? Indeed the more moderate of the Romanists fown these principles, and the Abbé Fleury, in ne of his admirable discourses, pathetically laents the destructive consequences of them. x pretend to vindicate Wickliff or any one who ay have vented fuch opinions: It is the fact I 1 concerned with; and the fact cannot be de-So let the church of Rome look well to own Popes, who fet the example of this perzious doctrine to Wickliff, and the same conmnation or extenuation will ferve for both. Another great and general topic of clamour ainst this council of Constance, is their making formal decree to debar the laity from partaking the Eucharistic cup. It seems this practice, so nfelledly contrary to politive command and conued obedience for many ages, had been, by nnivance and corrupt interpretation, gradually seping into the Romish church. But hitherto ere had been no interpolition of express authority LETTER about it; and many remonstrances had been made XXV. and petitions offered against it, where it had been imperceptibly introduced. Therefore, to bar the door for the future against any expectation of the old and instituted privilege of receiving the communion of the blood of Christ, in and by the fanctified cup of bleffing, this affembly boldly decrees, "That it is not to be doubted but that the " body and blood of Christ are entire, under "the fingle and separate species of either the " bread or the wine;" pronounces them heretics who shall affirm the contrary; and excommunicates any of the clergy who shall after this take upon them to communicate the laity in both This impudent decree, in direct opposikinds. tion to an express institution of Christ, will be a lasting reproach on the council of Constance: Tho' to preserve some appearance of modelty, they grant that it is in the power of the church to reverse this decree, and to allow the ancient practice. In both these transactions, of burning Huls, and taking the cup from the laity, this council is univerfally received as general by all the various parties of the Romish communion. But the original defign of their affembling has caused a strange division. This was to put an end to the unhappy schism which had lasted so long, and which they saw could not be closed by abetting either of the competitors, or admitting any plea, just or not, that they could make for themfelves. They therefore resolved to set all the three aside, and in order to lay a proper soundation for this arduous undertaking, they folemnly decree, "That this fynod being affembled un-"der the affistance of the Holy Spirit, consti"tuting a lawful general council, and representing the Catholic church militant, has an im-LETTER. mediate authority from Christ: To which sy- XXV. nodical authority all persons of what degree, quality or order so ever, the Papal Dignity not excepted, are bound to fubmit in things relating to faith and extirpation of schism, and in whatever tends to a reformation of manners n the church, both in the head and members." is deadly blow at the Pope's absolute soveznty gives great offence to the court of Rome; I tho' the church of France receives the whole :his council as general, and has built her faus declaration of 1682 upon its decisions, yet Jesuit party, Cajetan, Bellarmin, and the rest them, reject the first sessions of it, in which rebellious decree was passed. So that now re are two different fets of writers in the mish church, whom the Protestants have to 11end with: One fet, who admit every docval article of the council of Constance, but opposition to her Canon of discipline, mainn the Pope to be both supreme and infallible: 1d another set who receive the council of Connce in whole, and tho' they own the Pope to the head of the church, yet in conformity to it council's determination, allow that he is neier infallible in his judgment, nor above refortion in his morals. This distinction is of great to their controversial writers in their disputes h Protestants, as they can fly to either side for lter, according as they find themselves pushed: d there is no dealing with any individual of m, till it be first known what side of the quesn he is to stand by, or, in other words, wher he be a French or an Italian Papist. Yet y all make great boasts of their unity, and pre-

" ing

LETTER tend to be all of one and the same communion. XXV. by adhering to the Pope as the head of the church and vicar of Christ upon earth: Not remembering that at the same rate the old Arians might have claimed unity of communion with the orthodox, as both of them received Christ, and believed him to be the one Mediator between God and man: But in very different respects; since the one class believed him to be God, the other made a creature of him. Could there be unity betwixt these two? Or could their common belief in Christ under such opposite characters constitute them one church? So is it with the Papills: They all adhere to the Pope, they fay, and acknowledge him: But one party believes him infallible, another fallible, a distinction not very unlike to that between God and creature. Where then is the ground for unity? Or what article of difference is there among all the denominations of Protestants, more incapable of reconciliation or agreement, than this capital one of the church of Rome? It was in consequence of this bold decree passed in the council of Constance, that they proceeded to the actual deposition of all the three pretending Popes, and unanimously elected Martin V. in their stead. So Gregory resigned his title, after some little contest, and died at Recannati before the council broke up. John was call into prison, but made his escape and went to Florence, where he threw himself at the new Pope's seet, by whom he was made a Cardinal, and died soon after. But Benedict the oldest of the three still maintained his claim, and gave Martin no little trouble for seven years.

At last, after finishing this important bust ness, and in some measure settling the outward ice of the church, this famous council rose in LETTER year 1418, and the feveral delegates returnto their own homes. But before they broke up, ey fent over the Abbot of Pontignac to Scotid, to reduce our church to the obedience the council, and to withdraw her from Belict, who at that time had but few adheits besides. At the same time Benedict himf wrote to the governor and the estates, deng them to stand by him against all oppo-My author fays, the governor favoured scotichron. n·much: and it is not to be wondered at 1. xv. c. 24. The nation had long acknowledged 1, even for twenty years and upwards. Some our Bishops had received consecration from hands, as Bishop Wardlaw of St. Anws, Bishop Innes of Moray, and Bishop Lauof Glasgow, and none of them had scen r reason hitherto to renounce him. in wonder if they wished at least that a Se which they had so long espoused should duly diffcussed before they gave it up. Ac-dingly in a convention of the whole estates Perth, one Robert Harding a Franciscan ar, appeared for Benedict, and defended his = by no fewer than ten arguments, which to Ut supra. w the way of reasoning in those days, I Il here lay before you. "I. If Benedict should efign, he would throw his subjects into the peril of eternal damnation. 2. According to he due course of justice, Benedict ought to se fully reponed, before he be bound to refign. 3. If after the council, Benedict had been notoiously negligent, the Scottish Prelates have right o proceed against, and to remove him if he e incorrigible, in which case, and upon his LETTER "deposition, the Prelates of his obedience have XXV. "power to chuse the one Pope. 4. After Bene-"dict's removal, Martin ought to exhibit his "titles to the papacy to the Scottish church, " before he can claim her obedience. "nedict condemned the council of Constance, "fo that the prelates there could not make an "union in the church without the prelates of "Scotland. 6. They who received collation to "benefices from Benedict, and afterwards go "over to Martin, are no better than scorpions. "7. As long as John continues in prison, there "can be no union in the church without suspi-"cion. 8. Tho' Benedict were notoriously ne-"gligent, the rights of the church universal "would descend to the members of his obedi-"ence. 9. Because it is only they who can " be called catholics, and all others are both " schismatics and heretics. 10. Benedict has "never been negligent in what respected the uni-"on of the church, neither during the council "nor before." Such were the defences upon Benedict's fide. On the other hand, John Fogo a Monk of Melross preached and argued against these defences, in much the same manner that Harding had proposed them. The issue of all which was, that on Harding's dying foon after at Lanerk, which Fogo and his party interpreted in their own favour, "the contradiction fays my author, " ceased, and so but last of all "the Scottish church forsook Benedict and ad-"hered to Martin, in which her steadiness of be-

2 A 2

Thus we see how our church stood at this time, adhering indeed to a Pope for the sake

"haviour is much talked of and approved by « all."

regularity and order, but not with fuch a LETTER ish degree of subjection to him as to oppose XXV. at the thought the voice of the whole church aking in a general council. The Pope whom flood by, had always been on the fchiftical fide according to the present Romish koning of the fuccession. And yet we hear no censures nor interdicts from the other e during the competition, no formal reconations nor absolutions proposed when the ach was made up. I do not mean by this fervation to infinuate that our church was : Popish all this time, as she certainly did nowledge a Pope, which is no doubt the inguishing mark of Popery. But this Pope s, in some sense, of her own chusing; one o, she believed, had received the necessary wers, thro' a continuance of fuccession, and om upon that account she was willing for fake of peace and unity, to live in commion with, and in some measure to depend on. Her fifter church of England was of to the communion, and adhered to the feal Popes of that fide, to Boniface IX. Incent VII. Gregory XII. Alexander V. and hn XXIII. who were all in opposition to the ottish Benedict. Yet the two churches, with this difference of principle about Popes, held nmunion with one another, and agreed in at was then the established doctrine, and in ademning whatever had been branded as erefy. For we see the one nation burning eretics as well as the other, and Bishop ardlaw of St. Andrews as zealous, against the illards in Scotland when they appeared, as Andel of Canterbury was in England. Can it

LETTER be thought that they then entertained the same XXV. notions of the Pope's personal infallibility and absolute supremacy, which had been claimed by him in former times, and which his flatterers attribute to him at this day? And what if one of these national churches had, in those times of division, owned no Pope at all? Could that have broken communion, or thrown her out of the membership of the catholic church? Upon their own principles it could not: For between a false Pope and no Pope there is no difference, in the estimation of the Popes themfelves. None of Benedict's opponents looked upon him in the light of a Pope or head of the church, and he treated every one of them in the same manner. Whatever might be the opinion of their respective adherents, as to where the headship lay, the competitors all assumed it to themselves, and acted to one another accordingly.

But the decision of the council of Constance, whether just or not, put an end to this controversy for a while, and brought matters in fome measure out of their former confusion; fo our church joined now with the rest, in fubmitting to one Pope as appointed by a general council, and on that footing, accountable to it. In confequence of which we find a national council held at Perth on the fixteenth of July 1420, by William Stephen Bishop of Dumblaine, conservator, and in that character president of it: and we are told, all the decrees or statutes passed in it, were sealed with the Bishop's seals. But what these statutes were does not appear. There is one act mentioned in it about the Quotes of Testament, which was ivilege the Bishops had long been in post-LETTER on of, and which it seems, still needed some XXV. lation. But the main thing worthy of notice about this council is, that it was by the inherent authority of our own ch without the presence or presidency of foreign Legate whatever. And from this forward, we meet with no foreigner sitting the head of our synods, and domineering over Bishops with that pomp of Romish pride the had been seen in former days. The divisions had brought the Popes a step or in their pretensions, and had opened bles eyes to see and re-affert the antient ts and liberties of the church, which had invaded and trampled upon for so many

I am &c.

LETTER

XXVI.

L E T T E R XXVI.

James I. released from his Captivity in England ———Reforms Abuses both in Church and State——Persecution of the Followers of Wickliff and Huss——Council of Basil makes a new rupture in the Papal See——James I. barbarously murdered.

A.D. 1420. In the national affembly held at Perth, as mentioned in the preceding letter, confultations were renewed, about the redemption of the King, a matter of the utmost importance to the kingdom. For all this time, since the death of his father, he was a captive in England. And the his first ungenerous detainer Henry IV. had died in the year 1413, yet the next successor in that usurping line Henry V. continued his father's injustice, and obliged James to attend him, in person, to his wars in France, with a view to withdraw the Scottish troops from assisting the French, by using the influence and orders of their King, whom he had in his army. But in this sorting.

d view Henry was disappointed: For James LETTER avely, and with a spirit of true magnanimi- XXVI. , told him that he neither would as a King, or could as a prisoner, give any orders to his bjects, but would leave them to give all the istance they were able to a nation which d always been friendly to them. Upon which enry brought him back with him to Engid, and returned him to his former confine-However, upon Henry's death in the ar 1422, and leaving an infant heir of scarce year old, the English administration saw it r their interest to part with their royal cape, and so engage his friendship by liberty, hich they could make nothing of by ref-He had been married about a year fore to an English lady of the Lancastrian ne of their royal family, and now upon conuding the negotiation for his release, the wry which he should have got with his ueen was retained for the one half of his nsom, and hostages sent up for the other. nder these burdensome conditions, of a piece ith the rest of the unhandsome usage he had met ith, he at last returned to his native country and A-D-1424, rone, after eighteen years absence from both. Upon his return he immediately fet about recying the abuses which had been countenanced uring the weak management of his cousin Murxh, who had succeeded Robert his father in e government of the kingdom during the King's And to begin with the strict and impard execution of justice, he ordered Murdoch to dergo a formal trial by his peers; the conquence of which was, that he was condemned

r mal-administration, and publicly put to death.

2 B Two

LETTER Two of his fons were found guilty, and shared XXVI. the fame fate. This was a necessary, however disagreeable, act of severity; for both Murdoch and his father might have relieved the King long before it was done, if their ambition and defire to aggrandize their own family had not kept them back from doing their duty to their Sovereign, and led them into fundry illegal acts, to the prejudice of the crown, which now brought their family to ruin. The next care which the King took was to provide, as far as he could, for the interests of literature and the well-being of the church. With this view he visited the lately erected university of St. Andrews, countenanced the public disputations with his presence and approbation, and ordered that the Professors in Divinity and Canon Law should take care to recommend none to ecclesiastical preferments but such as were most capable and worthy in their several faculties, He likewise contributed to improve the church music, in which himself was a great adept, and was the first who brought organs into our churches Thus by his statutes, by his countenance and example, he did what lay in his power to reform whatever was amiss either in church or state, and to put things in both, on as decent and regular a footing as possible. Boece tells us of a convention of the States at Perth, called on purpole to retrench the luxury and extravagance in apparel and feasting, which the English in the Queen's retinue had brought into Scotland with them, and he puts a long and eloquent speech into Bishop Wardlaw's mouth on the occasion-This shews that the advantages of the King's English education and connections were not then thought so highly of, as our own countrymen in their histories of England represent them, but LETTER that all the national improvements were owing to XXVI. his own penetration and judgment, and to the force of a wife and good example. For it is univerfally agreed of him, that he discouraged every kind of intemperance and extravagance by his practice, being in his own person the plainest, the most sober, and most abstemious man in the whole kingdom. It would feem however, notwithstanding of the King's strictness and attention to the concerns of the church, that, after all the rigour of the council of Constance against John Huss, and under all the terrors of law that lay heavy on the followers of Wicliff in Britain, the opinions of these men were still gaining ground, and people were venturing to diffeminate them thro' all Europe. For in the year 1433 one Paul Craw a Bohemian was brought before Bishop Wardlaw, and being convicted of teaching the doctrines of Wickliff and Huss, was fixed to the stake and burnt. Boece fays, the King was mightily pleased with this execution, and gave the abbacy of Melross to John Fogo, for his activity in confuting this heretic, and bringing him to punishment. But the continuator of Fordun, who lived at the time, gives the glory of his confutation to the old inquisitor Laurence Lindoris, who was now Professor of the Common Law in St. Andrews, and who, he fays, allowed the he-Scotichron: retics and Lollards no rest throughout the king-However they both agree, that Craw was dom. fent from Bohemia on purpose. For on hearing of the murder of Huss, the Bohemians were so enraged at the violation of the safe-conduct, and the scandalous prohibition of the sacramental cup, that they threw off the Romish communion, and 2 B 2 openly INTITER openly declared war against the abettors of it, XXVI. which was carried on with various success for many years, and created no little trouble to the Pope and his adherents. And now, it seems, they sent this man into our country to strengthen their party, and thereby in some measure to fortify themselves against the persecutions of their enemies. Abbot Bower says, he came recommended as an expert physician, and that he was well acquainted with the scriptures, and remarkably ready in quoting them.

At this time the council of Basil was sitting, according to one of the ordinances of the late council of Constance, which decreed that another council should meet somewhere within seven or ten years, for keeping matters in the fettled state into which that council had put them. And Pope Martin having given his consent to that decree, did now, tho' against his inclination, appoint the meeting to be at Basil in Switzerland, which accordingly began in 1430, and fat nine years. The first thing they did was to confirm their superiority over the Pope, by repeating the famous decree of Constance, and by a new argument proposed by the Bishop of Burgos, the Spanish representative, who, drawing a comparison from the state, obferved, "That as in every well ordered kingdom "it is specially to be desired that the whole " realm should be of more authority than the "King, otherwise it were not to be called a " kingdom but a tyranny, fo likewise ought the " whole church to have more authority than the " Prince thereof, that is, than the Pope." This is the argument, as given us by the martyrolo-Fox's Aas, gift Fox who commends the strength of it, and &c. P. 87. it is not my business at present to argue against only mention it, to shew what source the LETTER ne of the people's power over Kings flows XXVI. and to whom they are obliged for the al invention and first use of it. this council deputies were admitted from Iohemian malcontents, among whom was the Englishman, craving a redress of grie-, and begging to have these four petitions 1. That the Eucharist should be adered to them in both kinds. 2. That eneath Priests should be allowed to preach. at ecclesiastics should have no endowments mporal jurisdiction. 4. That public crimes be punished by none but the magistrates. uccess of the Bohemian arms at home rightened the council into this concession, ry to the otherwise standing practice of omish church, not to admit any prohiarticles to a fecond examination. idmission of the Bohemian delegates, so ently injurious to the council of Constance, ne renewing the supremacy of the counhighly mortifying to papal pride, irritatpe Eugenius IV. who had fucceeded Maro that degree that, tho' he had at first his countenance to the council's fitting, w published a Bull for dissolving it, and ited one to meet at Bologna in Italy, 1 a year. This began a woeful quarrel: ouncil fighting against the Pope with ci-3 and threatnings, and the Pope defending If the best way he could with his usual ons of Bulls and excommunications. When ipture was thus found to be incurable, the il chose the Cardinal of Arles their pre-, and after struggling some years with Eu-

geni-

LETTER genius, who all the time shuffled and preva-XXVI. ricated, in such a way as disgusted the sew friends he had, the president at last, in name of the council, pronounced a formal sentence of deposition against him, in which they declare him "contumacious, disobedient to the decree = " of the universal church, violator of the hol " canons, disturber of ecclesiastical peace and " unity, fimoniac, perjured, incorrigible schif-" matic, pertinacious heretic, injurious to the holy "fee, &c." And then they unanimously elected Amadeus Duke of Savoy, who out of devotion had refigned his dominions to his fon, and upon his being now chosen Pope took the name In this contest all Europe was of Felix V. again involved. England fided with Eugenius; the Emperor, France and Spain supported the council: And it would appear that our church was upon that fide too, by their admittig a deputation from the council in the person of the famous Æneas Sylvius, who, tho' he afterwards altered his mind, and came to be Pope himfelf by the name of Pius II. and as fierce 1 Pope too as ever any of his predecessors had been, yet all the time he was in Scotland, he was a keen and laborious defender of the council both with his tongue and pen. Bishop Lelflie indeed, in his life of James the first, says " he was fent legate to our King by Eugenius, " legationem ad Regem nostrum ab Eugenio " obibat." But the writer of his life, who had been secretary to him while he was Pope, tells us that he came to Basil with Cardinal Capranic in the year 1431, and afterwards was secretary to Cardinal Albergotti, who fent him from Bail to Scotland to manage the council's affairHis own letters likewise shew that he had no LETTER Concern with Eugenius, yea that he was actually XXVI. engaged on his return from Scotland in the fervice of his rival Felix, and had never fo much as feen Eugenius, till he was fent by the Emperor Frederic to him in the year 1442 with Proposals of an accommodation. So that from the activity of fuch an agent, and the kind re-Ception which he acknowledges he met with here, it is more than probable our church would be of his fentiments, and think as well of the Council at Basil, as it is certain, he at that time did. Yet Mr. Collier, in his account of this council, positively says that "Scotland, excepting a few Lords, acknowledged Eugenius, and so fo vigorously abetted his title, that the Bishops "in a provincial council excommunicated Felix." Collier, Where Mr. Collier met with this provincial b.vi. p.671. council, he has not told us. Our countryman Mr Thomas Innes, who had as good opportunities and as great inclination to fearch into these matters as most people, has not, among all the histories and records he perused for that purpose, found any council in Scotland between the years 1420 and 1457, which space takes in all the time Crit. Essay, that this commotion lasted. And another of our p.594,596. writers, the continuator of Fordun, who wrote at the very time, speaks of the affair as being scotichron. then undetermined. This schism, he says, " be-1. xvi. c. 6. "tween Eugenius IV. deposed by the council of 8. " Basil, and Felix V. whom they elected in his " stead, began in 1438, and still subsists this year " 1443." and again " adhuc fub judice lis est &c. "the controversy is still undecided, on which " account the church of God is exposed to scandal

XXVI. As long, as the Emperor Sigismund lived, the council of Basil kept up their authority, and their Pope Felix was honoured and owned and applied to by the greatest part of Europe. The other Pope Eugenius all the time stood stiff to his pretensions likewise and paid no regard to the council's proceedings. For even while he lay under the

* This author gives us a detail of no fewer than twenty five schisms about the Papacy, with some mistakes indeed in chronology, which was not much attended to in his day, but at the same time containing some observations not unworthy of notice, as appears from his way of narrating the very first he mentions. "The first schism, he says, began in 349 in the time of "the Emperor Constantius and of Pope Felix II. His Anti-" pope was Liberius the Arian, who yet at first had been catho-" lic, but after the death of Felix by the divine vengeance burk " asunder, and his bowels gushed out." This is a singular account of the affair, and quite contrary to all that is to be met with about it in the church-hiltorians, who with one voice place Liberius in the canonical line of succession, while they differ bout admitting Felix into the list at all. For the Abbe Flewy observes that neither Optatus nor Augustine put Felix into the catalogue of the Bishops of Rome, without giving us his own Hist. Eccl. opinion, yet our Bishop Lesslie, in setting down the names of B. xiv. S.7. the Popes who sat during the reigns of our supposed christian De Gest. Kings, mentions Felix II. immediately after Liberius. What Scot.R. 38. Abbot Bower means by calling Liberius an Antipope is not easy to find out, as he was certainly ordained, and without any dispute too, before Felix, unless we shall suppose that he thoughthis turning Arian, which he expressly says he did, forfeited his character, and left the chair fairly vacant for Felix to fill it What ever reasons the man might have had for his speaking thus of Liberius, it is worthy of observation that we here find a Pope acknowledged as such, yet directly pronounced an Arian Heretic by an old Scottish writer, and him too neither Wickliffite nor Hussite, neither Lutheran nor Calvinist, nor liable to any of these opprobrious names which the highflown Romanists retort all arguments with, but one who, by his way of disputing against Resby appears to have been sufficiently sanguine on the Pope's side, or council's

as we would fay, a staunch enough Papist.

ncil's fentence, he held a meeting of his party LETTER lorence, where the Greek Emperor Palæologus XXVI. person, and a number of deputies from the tern church attended. In this affembly a fort mion was patched up between the Pope and n, and the Greeks were artfully perfuaded give up the contended points of doctrine, and n to acknowledge the Pope's supremacy in as ensive a sense as the court of Rome could de-But this answered no end: For no sooner e these delegates got home again, than they laimed against the trick put upon them, and acted their subscriptions. Their compliance Florence was dislowned by the patriarchs, and all the body of the Greek church, and the churches were foon as different and disunited

Jpon Sigismund's death, the authority of the neil of Basil began to decline. And his suctor Frederic inclining to have the breach made Eugenius, who was a violent man, took adtage of this disposition, and would hearken to agreement whatever. But his successor Nilas V. whom his conclave elected on his death, ag of a more pacific turn, and the competitor ix being prevailed upon, as he was a goodured man, to give up his claim, the rupewas at last healed, after some years of divisiand all Europe returned once more to the oience of one single and unrivalled Pope.

have laid all these incidents together, to give iew at once of this famous council at Basil, h all the most inaterial proceedings and coniences of it, where we cannot but observe a nge and unaccountable behaviour, and an unnting struggle for dignity and power on both

LETTER fides, to the neglect of the more important a XXVI. ticles of faith and reformation, especially intl earnestly defired concession of favouring the laid with the old privilege of the Eucharistic cup. It is no wonder that the Popish writers are divident ed in their opinions about this council, as upo their common principles they cannot well sustai a council to be general which could take upc them to depose and excommunicate a Pop whom their church to this day acknowledges t have been all his time a true and lawful Pop and in that character places in the roll of came nical succession. And what increases the diff culty is, that the very president of this counci the Cardinal of Arles, who had the princip hand in its decisions, and pronounced the sentence of deposition against Eugenius, is said to have wrought miracles after his death, and on that a count was beatified, as they call it, by Pope Ck ment VII. in less than a hundred years after the fentence, notwithstanding that Clement's laws predecessor Eugenius had, in his council at Fk rence, issued out a Bull of excommunication: gainst this man, and pronounced him á son c iniquity and child of hell. Such is the confusion in which their fystem, by their holding so ten ciously to it, unavoidably entangles them; and I impossible is it for them, with any degree of cor fistency, to extricate themselves out of the palm ble absurdities which these undeniable facts 1 clearly fix upon their incoherent principles.

While this council of Basil was sitting, and the Western church thus, as it were, tearing herse to pieces, our church and state both felt a mo lamentable shock at home. Our great and goo King James the first was most barbarously mu red, by a band of affaffins, on the twenty first LETTER February 1437, in the forty fixth year of his XXVI. e, and thirteenth of his personal reign. By is horrid murder, which was foon condignly enged on the execrable perpetrators, our nan was not only deprived of a most excellent vernor, but likewise lost the benefit of what ther regulations might have been expected m a King of his prudence and resolution. sides his other virtues, he was a man of great ty, according to the definition of piety in those rs. For the regretted, and even as is faid med the liberality of his predecessors in that y, yet he himself in the year 1429 founded and aly endowed a monastery at Perth for Carthusian nks, which was the only fettlement they ever l in Scotland, and has been corruptly called Charter bouse of Perth.

I am, &c.

C c LETTER

i fiter XXVII.

L E T T E R' XXVII.

Accession of James II——Quiet State of the Scotlish Church in his Reign——St. Salvator's college at St. Andrews founded by Bishop Kennedy——College of Glasgow begun by Bishop Turnbull—Invention of the art of Printing——K. James killed by an Accident at Roxburgh——Bad Effects of his Son's Minority——Account of the Promotion and Prosecution of the first Archbishop of St. Andrews——Remarks on that Affair——Tragical end of James III.——Resections on Buchanan's Account of it.

JAMES I. left only one fon James, who at his father's death was fcarce feven years of age. This was the cause of much disorder and contention for some years, not who should wear the crown, for that was not disputed, but who should have the management of the kingdom, and the care of the young King. And here all our historians, not excepting Buchanan himself, agree that the Bishops were of great service with their good good offices, in mediating between the great LETTER nen, and preventing their differences from break- XXVII. ng out into open violence. But especially much raise is given, and very deservedly, to Bishop Kenedv, who had fucceeded Wardlaw in the fee of it. Andrews. This worthy man was nephew to he late King by his fifter the lady Mary, and was illustrious by his virtues, as he was by his He had gone to Florence in the year 1438 o compose, if possible, the scandalous differences between Eugenius and the council of Basil, but eturned without success: And with the same audable view, when he was Bishop of St. Andrews, A.D. 1446. ie took a fecond journey to Italy, to propose neans for rectifying abuses, and taking away those ad divisions which even then subsisted about the Papacy. This was what the good men of those lays always had in their eye, to put a stop to the growing corruptions, and to bring about a reformation among all ranks and orders of the church. And had the Pope affifted, or but even permitted these pious endeavours, matters would have been adjusted in a more quiet and satisfactory way, than what arose from the necessities of after-times. But the ambition of the court of Rome blasted all attempts, and rendered every wish of this nature abortive. Complaints were frequently made of the decay of discipline, and of the many irregularities that were spreading every where in consequence of that decay. The Popes indeed made profession of remedying these disorders and called councils now and then for that purpose. But unless they got every thing managed in their own way, and so as to be subservient to their own interests, they would allow nothing to be done at all, and took care to thwart and disappoint every fcheme

LETTER scheme that was proposed contrary to their incli-XXVII. nations. To this was owing the little effect of our good Bishop Kennedy's second journey to Italy. Pope Eugenius was too haughty to regard any application of this kind. He who had triumphed over Cardinals and Prelates, affembled in a genera council from all the potent states of Europe, would not readily take much notice of a remonstrance from a private Bishop of the obscure church of Scotland. So the honest man, we are told, was obliged to return a fecond time, with the mortification of a disappointment. But to do as much good as he could in his own sphere, he fet himself to the cultivation of religion and learning at home, and to this end in the year 1456 he founded a college at St. Andrews, which he appointed to bear the appellation of St. Salva-This laudable spirit of providing for the public education of youth was now expanding itself over our country, after Bishop Wardlaw ha fet the example at St. Andrews. For, four year before this additional erection by Bishop Kennedy Bishop Turnbull of Glasgow began the universit y of Glasgow, which since his time has been much augmented by various and bountiful donations.

To the pious and prudent counfels of our Bishops at this time, such as this Bishop Kennedy, Bishop Lindsay of Aberdeen, Bishop Winchester of Moray, and Bishop Spence of Galloway, who were all men of great account, we may ascribe that calm and quiet state of the church during all this reign, which presents us with no intestine divisions among our churchmen at home, and no idle contelts that they were engaged in abroad.— Even Bishop Cameron of Glasgow whom Buchanan represents as a very worldly man, and a great oppressor, pressor, and who was cut off by a terrible death, LETTER XXVII.

from other accounts, and in the judgment of ner writers, seems to have been a man of a very serent character. He was one of the delegates om this church at the council of Basil, was mayears Chancellor of the kingdom, and did mayears Chancellor of the kingdom, and did mayengood services to his see of Glasgow. And all at Buchanan builds this ill-natured story upon, only common hearsay, which in itself is not ry creditable, and coming from such a pen, not hly to be believed.

In this reign there was a national council held A.D. 1457. Perth, in which, among other acts, a declara-

n was made concerning the King's right of nonation to benefices during the vacancies of bipricks: And two years after, another was held the same place by the Bishop of Aberdeen inservator and President, in which the foresaid claration was renewed.

In this reign too, the Eastern church met with A.D. 1453 dreadful calamity by the Turks taking Conntinople, where the Emperor Constantine Paologus was flain, and an end put to the Eastern apire, about eleven hundred and thirty years afr it had been fet up by Constantine the Great. ut the Western church reaped considerable adntages from this catastrophe, by the numbers clergy and learned men who fled from the ry of the barbarians, and brought with them any valuable writings of the old Greek Fathers, nich had not been known in the West before. ch were Emanuel Chrysoloras, Georgius Trazuntius, Theodorus Gaza, John Argyropulus, arcus Musurus, Demetrius Chalcondyles, and iny others, who taught the Greek language cier in private families or in public universities

LETTER in Germany and Italy, and thereby rubbed of XXVII. a great deal of that rust which the monastic me thod of study had brought upon the Belles But particularly, great thanks are due Lettres. to a Johannes Lascaris, a descendant of the Imperial family of that name, who was commission cd by Laurence of Medicis, that illustrious patron of learning, to the Turkish Sultan Bajazet II. and by his address and interest with that Monarch, who, amidst all the ruggedness of his nation, had some taste for literature, got a liberty to fearch all the known repositories of the East. for every thing that might be thought curious or useful in the polite arts, but especially in the affairs of the church. Accordingly, with this liberty, and with much travel, he recovered and brought to Italy a precious collection of manufcripts, which the Duke Laurence carefully deposited in his library at Florence, and which have made the Medicean library such a famous refource from all quarters of Europe, for discovery and knowledge, ever fince.

About this time too the art of printing, which had lately been lighted upon either at Mentz in Germany, or at Harlem in the low countries, (for both these places claim the honour,) was brought into England, and a press set up at Oxford, under the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. This was another lucky circumstance in favour of learning; and coinciding so opportunely with these Eastern discoveries, of which this invention made the communication so much easier than it could formerly have been, soon diffused among all ranks of people such a general thirst for reading, as not only served to refine their taste, but even contributed in a great measure to s that alteration in religious matters which LETTER is fuch a striking figure in the church an-XXVIL of the next century.

he fatal discovery of gunpowder made also irst appearance in this reign, and our nation felt the dismal effects of it. For while the was befieging the castle of Roxburgh, which English were in possession of, he was all of a en struck dead by the bursting of one of newly constructed field-pieces which he had ght before it, on the third of August 1460 he twenty ninth year of his age, and twenty l of his reign. This fudden death threw the on again under a minority: By which means as foon involved in confusion, and exposed iole pernicious consequences of ambition and l, which not only distressed the reign of es III. who was but fix years old at his fas death, but likewise have been the cause of ging that odium upon his memory which it under with most writers to this day. The en-mother, Mary of Gueldres, was an ambiwoman, and did all in her power to get her hands the government of the kingdom tutorage of the young King. She was warmly fed by Bishop Kennedy, whose wildom and rity had been highly esteemed in the last , and consequently were much listened to and cted in this. While he lived, the different ons were kept under some degree of restraint. unhappily, even by Buchanan's testimony, for the King and nation, he was taken away eath in the year 1466, having managed the ch and affisted the state twenty six years.now the King being arrived at twelve years e, and deprived of the care and counsel of 2 D

LETTER one, whom both as a Prelate and a relation he XXVII. had been accustomed to behold with reverence. and hearken to with pleasure, fell a prey to insidious and greedy flatterers, who took the advantage of his youth, and raised themselves at the expense of both his peace and reputation. Ma ny of the new churchmen too, now that the had got free from the restraint of Bishop Kera. nedy's authority and example, indulged them. felves in unbecoming liberties, and shewed little regard either to their character or function. All this foon appeared upon Bishop Kennedy's death, and fuch woful doings were now carried on in our church as had not been heard of in it for many years. Upon the vacancy of St. Andrews, Patrick Graham, who was uterine brother to Kennedy, and at the time bishop of Brechin, was chosen to succeed. This man proposed to go to Rome for confirmation: But suspecting that the Boyds, who then ruled the court, and were his bitter enemies, would impede his journey if they knew of it, he ventured to leave the kingdom without the King's licence, which in end proved his overthrow. While he was at Rome, George Nevil Archbishop of York, elated with the power and authority of his brother the Earl of Warwick, who was at this time called the King-maker in England, started anew the antiquated pretensions of his see over the church of Scotland-But upon Bishop Graham's representations, Pope Sextus IV. not only renewed the Bulls of exemption in favour of our church, but likewise by an express Bull of his own, erected the see of St. Andrews into a Metropolitan church, with all the other Bishops as its suffragans: And to honour this new primate the more, he appointed him his te for three years, with commission to rectify LETTER buses in the church, and reform the disso- XXVI. es of the clergy. With these powers the Archbishop, after some years stay at Rome, ear of the Boyds, hearing now of a change urt, thought proper to return, in hopes that haracter of Primate and Legate would prohim a proper reception. But in this he was ved: For the King, who was now eighteen of age, and had taken the reins of governinto his own hands, being stirred up by lishops, who, it is said, envied Graham's digand by the inferior clergy who feared his ity, inhibited by his royal authority the pubon of the Pope's Bulls, and forbade him to ise any of these Archiepiscopal powers till controversy should be properly decided. Neiwas this the worst of it. His enemies raisa William Schevez, a young divine of quick and a fiery spirit, to disturb the Archbibecause he had, on account of insufficiency, ed to install him in the Archdeaconry of indrews, to which he had got the King's no-And so far was the spite carried against that Locky, the Rector of the university, nding the Pope's grant of equality of jurifon, boldly denounced him excommunicated, ipon his contemning, as he justly might, the id sentence, application was made to the King In a word, the poor man was raffed with profecutions in the King's courts, the bankers at Rome distressed him so much ne moneys he had borrowed from them, and h he could not repay for want of his revewhich the King had feized, that it is faid, he nto fome trouble of mind, and became unfit 2 D 2

LETTER for the execution of his office. Upon which he XXVII. was accused at Rome, before the same Pope when had lately advanced him, and who now, to please the King, deprived him of all his dignities, and gave the Archbishoprick to Schevez his mortal enemy. After this he met with no pity from any quarter: But was thrown into close prison, first within the island of Inchcolm, from which, for fear of escape, he was transported to Dunfermline, and from thence to the castle of Lochlevin, where he died in the year 1478, having struggled in carrying the empty title of Archbishop twelve years.

Such is the substance of this strange story, as related by our historians. It contains several circumstances worthy of observation, and which may account for some equally strange pieces of procedure in after times. It is agreed on all hands, that Bishop Graham was a learned and worthy man, and even Buchanan commiserates his fufferings. But if there had not been too much of ambition in his character, he would not have accepted, much less have solicited, a title which was new and unprecedented in his country, and which he could not but know would be taken in ill part by his brethren. There is certainly an error here on his side, and all his after hardships seem to have slowed from this first falle step of his own. It is faid the other Bishops oppoled him, out of envy. Perhaps they did: But whether so or not, their opposition had other and good enough grounds to go upon. The Bishops of Scotland had long been upon a footing of equality, with only some degree of respect and deference voluntarily paid to the Bishop of St. Andrews on account of his fee, and out of eneration to the name of their patron Apostle, LETTER thich the place had long bore. And now to XXVII. and one of their own number, and him too not need oldest among them, surreptitiously stealing to precedency, and coming home with titles and powers to which their consents had never een asked, was reason sufficient to put them on neir guard against such a new and unnecessary neroachment. They had now for a long tract of time been in use to manage their own matters without a metropolitan, either foreign or domestick, and what they had long done, and that too good purpose, they might reasonably think they ould still do in the old way.

Actic

But some will say, the Pope had ordered therwise; and as they professed obedience to the 'ope, they ought in duty to have submitted to he Primate whom he fent them. Yet this was not the first instance in which the Bishops of Scotand had rejected the Pope's appointments of this and, at the same time that they acknowledged There had been hemselves his humble servants. Bulls again and again from Popes in support of he metropolitical claim of York, which they never regarded, and yet continued as much de-The truth is, roted to the Pope as if they had. hat the Pope's Bulls were so issued out at raniom, and to please any favourite or powerful party, that they were feldom minded but by those who had an end to ferve by them: And many times the Popes themselves, after they had once given them out of their hands, took no farther notice of them, but like the oftrich with her young, left them to shift for themselves. Such was the case in this very affair. For tho' Sixtus, whether regularly or not, invested Bishop Graham with the primacy

LETTER Primacy over all Scotland, and made an Arch-XXVII. bishop of him, yet as soon as the tide turned against this Archbishop, the Pope turned too, and homologated the very first accusation that his encmies brought against him. Was this acting the part of a fair and upright judge? Or was it even acting as his Predecessors had often done in such cases? Should he not, as they had used to do. have called the cause to Rome, before himself in person? Or, as was the primitive practice, empowered commissioners to have examined it at home, and given the accused man fair play for his character, and as matters turned out, even for his life. It is true, Bishop Leslie says, the Pope sex a legate into Scotland upon this business: But that was only to put the fentence of condemnation in execution, not to take trial of the complaint, and to hear what the Archbishop had to say for himfelf. His words are, "Missus est a Papa in Sco-" tiam legatus Husmannus dictus, qui Patricium "Grahamum St. Andreæ Archiepiscopum, Pape " Cardinaliumque sententiis damnatum, omni dig-" nitate ordinibusque ecclesiasticis dejiceret, ac " schisma, simoniam, aliaque quæ in se admist " scelera, perpetuo carcere vindicari juberet." So that Husman was not the Pope's inquisitor, as Spotswood calls him, but by Bishop Leslie's account, his executioner, to degrade a man who had been condemned by the Pope and his Cardinals for fchism, simony and many other crime, and to adjudge him to perpetual imprisonment Indeed I am surprized at Bishop Leslie's way of narrating this affair, without throwing in the least word of lympathy or concern for the harsh treatment that Graham met with. But it was a Pope's doings, and to Bishop Leslie that was enough. However, owever to other people who have not their eyes LETTER IZZled with the glare of papal splendor, the XXVII. hole of this procedure will appear to be no betrathan one continued mass of confusion, and of ch double dealing upon all hands, as is enough disgrace the Annals of any church: And I munot see how or by what excuse any of the arties concerned can be fully vindicated.

The Pope certainly was rash, not to call it orfe, in all the steps he took in it; first in lifting p Bishop Graham too high, and then in throwing im so very far down. Graham himself, I suspect, ad been rather forward in his application, and ad, unadvisedly, entangled himself in the difculties that overwhelmed him. Even the other ishops, the I would willingly account for their ehaviour upon fuch grounds as might be constent with their character, yet by their after anduct in submitting to the very title in Schevez hich they had opposed in Graham, discover mething which shuts the door against any aology that otherwise might be offered for them. 'he young King, now past the twentieth year of is age, tho' generally blamed for his harshness his blood-relation, seems to be as little culpble in the affair as any of them all. It was a ight belonging to his crown, and had been conrmed by statute in his father's time, to have he management of the church-revenues in time f a vacancy: And it had been customary with is predecessors in Scotland, and with the neighouring Kings of England, to feize these tempoalities and keep them in their own hands, when he elect Bishop was not agreeable to them.

I am not to argue for or against this practice. It was the misfortune of the times, and as heavy

LETTER heavy a misfortune as ever the church groaned XXVII. under, to have two such jarring interests to attend to, and to be obliged to depend upon the Pope in spirituals, and in temporals upon the King.-When these two patrons happened to agree, it did tolerably well: But when they differed, 28 was too often the case, the consequences were lamentable. The Pope claimed the disposal of spirituals, and this the Kings never contended with him: But his disposal of the temporalities was never yielded to, but thro' force and with reluc-When therefore the spiritual powers were given by the one, and the temporal encourage ments, which are thought so necessary, kept back by the other, what could be expected in the end but strife and disorder? So difficult is it to serve two masters so opposite to one another, I shall not fay as God and Mammon, but as the Popes and Kings of those days for the most part were. From the beginning it was not so. The church at first was independent of both, and owned no master but the ONE who is truly fo. For this One she had now got two, and the effects of the change have been often and feverely felt. Poor Archbishop Graham fell a sacrifice to the competition. The debts, which he had foolifhly contracted at Rome, to support an idle and unneceffary grandeur, lay heavy upon him when he was denied the revenues which he trusted to for the payment of them; and the Pope's forfaking him under the cloud of royal displeasure, which his regard for the papal dignity had brought upon him, could not but affect him deeply, and perhaps threw him into that state of incapacity which was charged against him.

But whatever shall be faid of the rest of the actors

actors in this scene, the part acted by Schevez the LETTER principal agent admits of no vindication. The XXVII. man indeed succeeded in his views, and got himfelf invested with the Archiepiscopal pall at Holy- AD. 1478. roodhouse. But how he governed his see in particular, or the church in general, is not much taken notice of: Only, as Archbishop Spotswood observes of him, "his entry being such as we have feen, did not promise much good." Mr. Innes finds a national council spoken of as held or defigned to be held at St. Andrews in the year 1487, which was within Schevez's time: But whether he presided, or what was done in it, we are not told. By what was going on in the nation at that time, it would feem that this meeting was defigned for no good to the King. His next brother Alexander Duke of Albany had for forme years been heading the discontented part of the nobility against him, and Archbishop Schevez. whom he had, in the way we have feen, raifed to that dignity, had joined the rebellious faction. They had for some time kept the King a prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh, till on a change of measures he got out of confinement, and the Archbishop with his accomplices were obliged to thift for themselves. Bishop Leslie says, Schevez was compelled after this to resign the Archbishoprick in favour of Andrew Stuart the King's uncle, and to accept the bishoprick of Moray, to which Stuart had been nominated. But Bishop see his Keith has proved this to be a mistake, by producing Catalogue, sufficient testimonies that they both kept their re-Pective fees without any exchange till their deaths. However it is probable, as I faid, from Schevez's intimacy with the Duke of Albany who, by all accounts of him, was certainly a turbulent 2 E

LETTER man, that this proposed meeting to be at St. Arm

XXVII. drews, contrary to the standing custom of holding their assemblies for the most part at Perth, habeen designed to act in concert with such of the. nobility as were now plotting the King's ruit And what foon followed justifies this probability. little indeed to Schevez's credit, all things confider. ed, but agreeably enough to Spotfwood's observation concerning him. For the very next year the rebellious party, finding their schemes ripe for execution, and having got the young Prince James, then only fourteen years of age, into their hands, collected an army, and fought the King with an inferior body of his friends at Bannockburn, where the King had the misfortune to be. defeated in battle, and was treacherously murdered in flying for his life, on the eleventh of June 1488, being the twenty eighth year of his reign, and thirty fifth of his age: A man of a mixed character, and whose administration one can hardly endeavour to justify, after the load of disp-probation which has been laid upon it. Only this much may be faid that, whether faulty or not, he was certainly unlucky in being distressed by his nobles, haraffed by his brother, and at last driven to the disagreeable necessity of fighting for his crown and life against a superior army of his subjects, with his own fon and heir at their head. Buchanan fays, "his death was at-"tended with this particular ignominy, that the " convention of the states voted him to be just-" ly flain, and decreed that they who had taken " arms against him should never have it im-" puted to them nor their posterity." But with all due deference to Mr. Buchanan's fagacity, may it not be asked, who these states were, or what what kind of convention it was that passed this LETTER ignominious vote? He himself tells us that the XXVII. King had many friends, the Earls of Huntly and Lenox, the Lord Forbes, and others of the great men who stood true to him, and sought to avenge his death. And to shew that the general opinion was not unanimous in favour of this conspiracy. Bishop Leslie mentions it as a thing not to be passed over in silence, that, "when the conspi-" rators applied to the old Earl of Douglas, " whom James II. had banished, and who, upon " his venturing back into the kingdom, had " been catched and imprisoned by this King in " the monastery of Lindoris, that experienced " nobleman diffuaded them all he could, from " the attempt, as being not only full of wicked-" ness and criminality, but likewise attended with " the utmost difficulty and peril, which his own ', and his family's example might demonstrate " to them."

But to yield to Buchanan his favourite point of the authority of the states, his observation, one should think, tends the other way, and the cautious decree of his states, instead of adding ignominy to the King's death, will appear rather to throw a suspicion of difference upon the perpetrators of it. At any rate to fay that he was "jure cæsus," justly and lawfully slain, is an affront upon the human understanding, and upon all the principles of religion and morality that we have any notion of. Had he fallen in battle, and with his fword in his hand, fomething might have been faid by fuch as pay no regard to the facredness of a King's person: But for two or three private men to butcher him unarmed, and without resistance, when upon their own prin-2 E 2

LETTER ciples they might have apprehended him an XXVII. brought him to public justice, as was done one of his royal posterity, was even then again 1 all law and equity, and what no after-lanction could render either legal or innocent in the fight either of God or man. Besides Buchanan's expression is an addition of his own: The original act fays no fuch thing: It only bears "that "the flaughter done and committed in the field " of Stirling, where our Sovereign Lord's farher "happened to be flain, and others divers his 66 Barons and lieges, was allouterly in their de-" fault and coloured deceit done by him and "his perverse council diverse times before the faid sield." There is no word here of the thing being just or lawful with respect to the King's particular fate, but only the blame of the general flaughter in the field is laid upon him and his adherents. Nay fo far is their meaning from any tendency towards Buchanan's malevolent affertion, that the very fame states, in the third parliament of James IV. on a complaint given in, that "the persons who put violent hands on the King's father's person, and slew "him, are not punished," offer a reward to any who shall discover these murderers. Which is an incontestible proof that they had never thought the murdering of him just and lawful, however much they might have wished it believed, that he by his misconduct had brought all the mischief upon himtelf.

> But this is not all: These very states, notwithstanding of the care they had taken to preferve themselves from the danger of the law by their bold and self-exculpating decree, do not seem to have been easy in their consciences, under all the

fety which they had provided for their per-LETTER
For we find them, two years after this, XXVII.

ng to the Pope Innocent VIII. for abfolurom the censures of the church, which they ncurred by their insurrection, protesting, t they were forry from the bottom of their arts, and willing to do penance for it." The indeed was gracious enough to their suppli, and gave commission by his Bull to the ts of Paisley and Jedburgh, and to the ellor of Glasgow, to absolve them accord-

The Bull speaks of some of the Lords al being concerned in the rebellion, which to imply that even the Bishops stood in need folution; altho' it was not very confonant mitive usage that they should receive it from ts, who, however much their Peers in Parat, were their inferiors in the church: But ver was the nature or extent of the Bull, polication for it sufficiently shews the opiof the nation, when they came to a cooly of thinking, after the first fury of faction And if what is faid by all our histori-James IV. be true, that to shew the for-I fense he had of his father's death, and of and which he was innocently led to have he wore an iron chain about his body, and year of his life added a link to it, we have the whole a confirmed refutation of Buchashrewd but ill-founded inference, that the the rebels for their own fecurity was a pubrk of infamy upon the King's death.

natever were the faults or failings of this py monarch, his royal fuccessors owe him small tribute of grateful remembrance, for in a peaceable way enlarged their domi-

LETTER nions by an addition of territory which our lines XXVII. had never been in full possession of before. In the year 1469 he married Margaret, daughter to Chiltian King of Denmark, who in consideration of that marriage mortgaged the Islands of Orbus and Shetland for the payment of fifty thousand rixdollars, in dowry with his daughter, and the wards on her bearing a fon, made an absolute of on, and gave up all claim to them for ent. By this accession of territory, our national church got another Bishop added to the old number and from this time we have a clear and regular account of the succession of the Bishops of Other ney, some of whom made a considerable for both in the church and in the state.

I am, &c.

* These islands had been till now part of the dominions of Nov way, and tho' before this we find Earls of Orkney among of Scots Nobles, yet the first of them, Henry Sinclair of Rolls had this title from Haco King of Norway, with confent of own Sovereign in 1379, and conveyed it to his grandlon, whose time, upon the country which gave the title being which to the dominions of Scotland, the title was annexed w Crown in 1471.

LETTER XXVIII.

ession and prudent Behaviour of James IVtate of the Church in his reign - The See of Flasgow made an Archbishoprick - That of St. Indrews successively filled with two Youths -'niversity and King's College of Aberdeen found-1 by Bishop Elphinstone—James IV. with be Flower of his Nobility killed at Flowden-Leflections on that fatal Event.

N the death of James III. the young Prince, A.D. 1488. who had been in a manner forced into the I against him, was his lawful and undoubted ; and as the rightful possession of the crown ges all defects, succeeded to him without any emony or interruption. Some of the former alists indeed stood out for a while, complaining he malcontents had done in the former reign, t the King was in the hands of a party who murdered his father, and wished to have every ig managed their own way. But the young ig's prudent behaviour to both sides, joined h an indisputable title, soon dissipated all the EETTER ill humour, which had fo lately prevailed, and XXVIII. effected a general reconciliation.

In the church matters were not fo calm and quiet. The new dignity of a Scottish Archbishop, which had been so fatal to the first possessor of it. feems to have had fomething great and alluring in it. For now Robert Blackader Bishop of Glasgow fet up for the honour of his fee likewife, and by his address procured a Bull from Pope Innocent VIII. erecting the See of Glasgow into an Archbishopric and ordaining Gallowy, Argyle and the Isles to be subject to it. This was a new stretch of papal authority, in direct violation of his predecessor's indulgence to St. Andrews, and at the same time a fuperfluous encroachment upon the constitution of our church, which had been long governed without any formal metropolitan at all, and never was fo extensive as to stand in need of two-Schevez we are told highly referred this indignity, but had not interest enough to prevent it. fame measure he had lately given, was now in part returned back upon himself, and he was obliged to acknowledge Glasgow to be an Archbishoprick, with refervation of some degree of precedence to his own fee. How the rest of the Bishops or the court relished this new erection, we know not. But while the Bishops were thus contending about preeminence, the doctrines of Wickliff and Huss were gaining ground fast in the country, and had already taken deeper hold than they could afterwards be torn from.

spot. b. ii. Archbishop of Glasgow employed in is, his convening no fewer than thirty persons, among whom were sundry gentlemen of fortune in the West country, before the King and council, where he charged

The first ecclesiastical business we find the new

arged them with a number of heretical articles, LETTER he called them, and demanded to know what XXVIII. s their belief concerning them. I shall afterrds have occasion to take a fuller view of these cicles, and only observe at present, that the peris accused answered the Archbishop's questions th fuch fmartness and ingenuity, and defended emselves with such an air of resolution, that it is thought prudent to difmifs them with an adonition to take heed of new doctrines, and to ntent themselves with the saith of the church. hat might have been the cause of such uncomon lenity at this time, we need not inquire. rhaps the fecular arm, without which there uld be no capital punishment, had not been idy enough to back the ecclefiaftical fentence, d fend fo many subjects out of the world. to the fact itself, we may reasonably conclude, at the conduct of the clergy gave great encougement to the spreading of these opinions: And cording to the principles of the church at that ne, as to what was orthodox or heretical, it is y to fee that while the husbandmen either slept were tearing one another, the tares were fown. rindeed what elfe could be expected, while the shops, who by their office were defigned to teach d instruct the people, took up their time in edless and expensive journeys to Rome and ter foreign parts, or in maintaining their own perfluous titles and dignities at home?

This very Archbishop Blackader, who, as we ve seen, might have found enough of employent in his own diocess, yet turns his back upon and sets out in his old age to visit the holy tees in Palestine, but died by the way. He is d to have been a pious, good man: Would not

2 F

LETTER his piety have been as properly displayed, and XXVIII. shone as conspicuously, in looking after the slock committed to his charge? Especially at a time when, in his estimation, and from his own experience, there were wolves breaking in among them to tear and destroy them. The devotion of visiting that once facred spot of ground in the East, whatever may be differently thought of it, might have done well enough with private persons who had leifure for it, and were engaged in no necessary business to require their attendance at home. But for men in a publick character, and of the church too, in fuch a critical fituation, to neglect the work they had taken in hand, and for which they were fo well paid, only to fatisfy an useless piece of curiosity, is altogether inexcufable, as being fo unprofitable in itself, and exposed to so many dangerous consequences. It would have been more becoming in this Bishop Blackader, to have been labouring all the time among his thirty fuspected heretics, with the Apostolic instruments of instruction and example; and if he had recovered but one of them to what he reckoned the true faith, it would have been as ferviccable to the interest of religion, and fully as confolitory to himself in his last moments, as all the fine fights he could have feen in the Holy Land. I shall not lay hold of the ill-natured sufpicion, that vanity might have been the man's motive, to make a parade of his new dignity with all the enfigns and ornaments of it, among the various people by the way. I shall allow him to have acted from a better principle, and to have been as devout a man as Bishop Leslie represents him; Yet furely, to fay the best of it, his devotion was not only ill-placed, but as matters then flood, LETTER very ill-timed. XXVIII.

The state of our church in this reign has been fadly complained of, and lamented by most wri-The King himself is generally well spoken of, for his administration of state-matters: But his management of what lay to his hand in the concerns of the church does not appear to be fo commendable and worthy of his character. On the vacancy of the see of St Andrews, by the death of Schevez in the year 1496, the King thought proper to give this Archbishoprick to the Duke of Ross a younger brother of his own, who at that time could not be above twenty years of age, and confequently very unfit for such a weighty and important charge. And which was still more extraordinary, when this Prince died, in the year 1503, the fee was kept vacant feveral years, and at last filled with Alexander Stuart, a natural fon of the King's by a daughter of Boyd's of Bonshaw, who was but eight years old when the Archbishoprick was defigned for him, and no more than fourteen when Pope Julius II. promoted him to it, while he was abroad on his travels for his improvement. The next year he returned home, and in 1511, when he was but fixteen years old, his father made him Chancellor of the kingdom, and the Pope constituted him his Legate a Latere in Scotland, and besides the revenues of the Archbishopric, allowed him to hold the rich abbey of Duntermline and the Priory of Coldingham in commendam, all which he kept till he was killed at Flowden in the eighteenth year of his age.

So here was the see of St. Andrews, the oldest episcopal feat in the kingdom, and now become the dignisted capital of the national church, not

2 F 2 indeed

LETTER indeed kept vacant for seventeen years, but, which XXVIII. was worse, thrown away upon boys, who however illustrious for their birth or qualities, were certainly improper for being Bishops, and such Bishops too, in Christ's church. The King's affection to a brother and a child may be in some measure excusable. But the Pope's compliance was fcandalous and bafe. Indeed the character of the two Popes who humoured the King in these extravagant stretches of affection, prevents our being very much furprized at any part of their conduct. Alexander VI. who was the Pope that filled the first vacancy, is infamous even among his own party. The advancement of his children. the Borgias, was all his study, and the histories of these times are full of the wicked and abominable methods he and they took for that purpole, which at last brought the whole family of thems to a tragical end. The other Pope Julius II. who is commonly called the Martial Pope, tho' a mara of a different turn from Alexander, was so bent upon his warlike schemes, which he had his own private reasons for, that he would stick at nothing, however uncanonical and hurtful to the church, to ingratiate himself with any Prince who he thought, could be affifting to him in these defigns. And at this time in particular, he was engaged in a troubletome war with Louis XII. of France, who was not only counteracting all his ambitious projects with a numerous army at his very doors, but had likewise, with consent of the Emperor Maximilian, called a council at Pifa to enquire into his conduct, and to treat him perhaps as the councils of Constance and Basil had done his Predecessors. So he had need of all the friends he could make, to ward off the intended blow.

he knew the connection that had long subsisted LETTER ween France and Scotland, his policy would XXVIIL d him to do what he could to detach our ig from that connection, and secure him to his n party.

He had some years before this sent a nuncio Scotland, to present the King with the pomis title of Protector of the Christian Faith, and give the greater grace to his present, he sent him urple crown with flowers of gold, and a fword h a golden hilt, and scabbard set with jewels. author fays, this honour was conferred upon Lellie de n for his zeal in driving herefy out of his do-Geft. p. nions, and adds that "tho' before this he had 330, 331. always been remarkably catholic, yet now, Apostolico quodam spiritu totus inflammatus videretur, he seemed to be altogether fired with a kind of Apostolick spirit, so that he never fuffered herely to bud, nor religion to be neglected, within the kingdom." Yet in all our tories we fee nothing of his remarkable doings her for the one or the other of these purposes. ne innovators of the West country, the Lollards Kyle, as they were called, had been examined fore him, but escaped without punishment, and e received doctrines were in his time more comted and spoken against than ever they had been It is probable therefore that the Pope's mpliment had been intended as much to influce him and make a friend of him in time to me, as to reward him for what was past.*

Bishop Leslie indeed tells a wonderful story of him immedily after this account, perhaps as an instance of his Apostolic spi-"that he travelled inpilg image and alone, from Stirling thro' Perth and Aberdeen to Elgin, a journey of one hundred and thirty miles in one day, and the next day to St. Duthack's

But whatever was the cause or design of this 1.ETTER XXVIII. fondness, it could not have produced a greater innovation than the two instances I have mentioned of preferring such incapable persons to such high trusts in the church. What old Canon or laudable precedent could the Pope allege for it? What great or useful end could he propose by it? The plenitude of his power might in those days do any thing. But ought that power to have been thus wantonly abused? Or could it, with all its fulness, capacitate these youths for exercising the office committed to them? It had been better to have left the See vacant all the time, than thus to burlesque the sacred character by such a repeated farce. And I cannot help expressing my furprize to find these two young gentlemen placed in the catalogue of the Archbishops of St. Andrews, and the last and youngest of them too with the high epithet of " a worthy Prelate." That they were actually confecrated by the impofition of hands I can scarcely think, as I can see no account of it: And in strict propriety of speech I know no right that any one can have to be called a Prelate in the church, without it. But wha opinion could the other Bishops form of this proce dure, especially to see a boy of fixteen years of ag cloathed with the legatine power, which they ha been accustomed to look up to with reverence an awe? It was no wonder tho' they neglected thei spiritual functions, and began to think little of character, which they faw the Head of the churc

with-

[&]quot;in Ross, which was forty miles further, in time to reach Maxe" tins." Whatever devotion might have been in this jaunt, there certainly was an incredible deal of bodily strength in it, and the narration, if true, is more a panegyric on the one than the other.

f manner. And how could the laity relish such an unheard KXVIII. flagrant stretch of authority, as ventured to enush the episcopal office, which they were told, as originally designed for instructing and governing the flock of Christ, with youths, who themalves needed instructors and governors?

Yet even at this time there were Bishops in our hurch worthy of that facred character, and difinguished by their zeal in the cause of religion nd learning. Such was the famous Bishop Elhinston of Aberdeen, a man universally esteemed nd praised by every writer that speaks of him. Ie was translated from Ross to Aberdeen in the 'ear 1484, and in this station was at great pains o prevent the fatal rupture between the nobles nd King James III. whose cause he never desertd, but faithfully adhered to him to the last. Yet in the accession of his fuccessor, this loyal Bishop vas still in high esteem at court, and much employed in publick offices, and on many important ccasions. At last, the commotions of the state eing in a good measure settled, he found leisure execute a defign he had long intended. he year 1494 he founded an university in Old berdeen, where his cathedral stood, and having btained the royal patronage, he gave his new rection the title of King's College. He likewise egan the bridge upon Dee, and left money for nishing that useful work. He made a collection f Canons for the reformation of abuses, and inruction of his clergy. In a word, both in pubck and private life he was a valuable man, and n truth and reality, " a worthy Prelate." He ad the misfortune, while he was Bishop, to see Wo Kings, with both of whom he had been a great favourite, brought to a lamentable end. XXVIII. James III. murdered by ruffians at Bannockburn, and James IV. slain in battle on the field of Flowden, which last calamity he did not long survive; for the year after, being called up to Edinburgh on public business, he sickened by the way, and died a few days after his arrival, univerfally regreted.

We have already feen what steps Pope Julius took, and what concessions and compliments he made to our king, to draw him off from the French interest, and to prevent his disturbing Henry VIII. of England, whom the Pope had engaged to attack France upon that fide. But all was ineffectual. The old amity between Scotland and France prevailed against the Pope's flatteries, and James resolved to support Louis, and prevent, if possible, his being overpowered by the formidable confederacy which Julius had formed This irritated the Pope to such 3 against him. degree, that, as Lord Herbert, in his life of Henry VIII. tells us, he vented his displeasure by excommunicating the very man whom himself had lately dubbed Protector of the Faith, and that not for any breach of, or departure from that faith, but entirely for not forfaking an old ally, with whom he had always been in league and friendfhip. * However, notwithstanding of the Pope's

^{*} This circumstance is not taken notice of by our own historians. Bithop Leslie indeed speaks of the treaty between James and Louis, but his professional reverence for the Pope, and his personal regard for the King, (of whom he fays "nihil habuit Bri-"tannia justius aut fanctius, there was not an honester or more upright man in Britain,") would not allow him to mention the excommunication, tho' he had known of it, as he saw that would throw a reflection where he would not have any to light. And Buchanan only fays, that the English kept a dead body, dif-

ispleasure, the King went on with his prepara-LETTER ons, and having collected an army, marched XXVIII. rith it into England, where, contrary to the adice of all his nobles, he gave battle to a supeior force of the English commanded by the Earl f Surrey, but was defeated and flain. he heaviest blow which Scotland for a long time, or perhaps ever, had felt: The loss of a beloved King, with the flower of the nobility, and vast number of the common people; and that ofs weighty enough in itself, increased by the ong and troublesome minority that succeeded. There was much doubt at the time about the ing's fate. It was faid by some, that he got off om the field, but was murdered, as his father ad been, in a private house. And by others lat, after the defeat, he went to the Holy Land, accomplishment of a vow which he had made to • penance for his father's death. But the general and most probable opinion is, that he fell in the eld near Flowden on the fatal ninth of Septemer 1513, in the thirty ninth year of his age and wenty fifth of his reign, leaving a fon James, not wo years old, by his Queen Margaret, eldest aughter to Henry VII. of England, thro' whom ame the fuccession of our royal line to that rown.

All our historians speak well of this King. Buhanan himself is copious in his praise, tho' in he conclusion he cannot abstain from throwing a ur upon his memory for his prodigality and poerty, which, he fays, "if he had lived longer, thich they had found and imagined to be the King's, a long time aburied, " because he had facrilegiously taken up arms against the Pope:" . 2 G

LETTER " might have extinguished all his former reputa-XXVIII. "tion by the necessary imposition of new taxes, " fo that his death may be faid to have been, 46 tho' immature, yet seasonable and convenient " for himself." It is a strange pleasure that this fine writer takes in the flaying of Kings, and put ting favourable glosses upon it. James III. he fays, was "jure cæsus," lawfully slain: James IV. "commode," conveniently and leafonably. This is a peculiar way of complimenting a good King, to cut him off in the flower of his life, for fear of his growing worfe. However, whether his death was seasonable for himself or not, it was certainly most unseasonable and incommodious to the nation. The loss of so many great men, who fell about their Sovereign's person, and probably would not have fallen if he had stood, was a greater hurt to the country than it could have fuffered from all the taxes which he either could or would have imposed upon it. To increase the misery, the heir of the crown was an infant

> * Besides the King and his promising son the timber Archishop of St. Andrews, there were sain on the fatal field of Flowden, twelve Earls, Argyle, Athol, Bothwell, Caithness, Cassilis, Crawford, Errol, Glencairn, Lenox, Morton, Montrose, and Rothes, nine Lords, Borthwick, Colvil of Culrofs, Elphinston, Lovat, Maxwell, Ross, Sinclair, Semple and Somervile, four eldest sons, and heirs of Angus, Cathcart, Marischal and Oliphant, and the predecessors of the following nineteen noble samilies, Dalhousie, Galloway, Gowrie, Nithsdale, Kirkudbright, Kenmure, Kilfyth, Lauderdale, Mar, Melvil now Leven, Napier, Panmure, Queensberry, Seaforth, Southesk, Traquait, Tweeddale, Weems and Winton. Such and so memorable was the bloody battle of Flowden, that the mournful remembrance of it has been handed down to us in an old ballad, of as affecting a composure both for matter and music as any we have, and which is is so well known among the vulgar to this day by the name of " The Flowers of the Forest are faded away."

of scarce two years of age, and in that state ex-LETTER posed as a prey to the ambitious designs of such XXVIII. of the grandees as had survived that melancholy catastrophe. The state of the church too was such as called aloud for reformation, and would have required a steady hand to probe the fore to the bottom, and extirpate the prevailing corruption. Instead of making any serious attempts that way, we have feen the greater part of our churchmen minding nothing but the temporal advantages annexed to their facred character; jaunting in pomp to Rome, to Avignon, to wherever the Popes their new masters kept their courts, spending the wealth of the nation, which had been given them for other purposes, in these slashy excursions, and returning with vain titles, and bad examples. At home we have observed the confequence of these abuses, discipline despised, doctrine either neglected or corrupted, reformation and instruction fet at nought, and nothing recommended but rearing spacious buildings, and leaving rich legacies, under the specious pretence of pious donations. So that had it not been for Iome good men who shone forth now and then in thele dark and degenerate times, fuch as Bishop Traill and Kennedy of St. Andrews, Bishop Elphinston of Aberdeen, and some others, who were a credit to their function, and supported the honour of our church, it is hardly to be thought that the unwieldy fabrick would have stood fo long as it did, but would have tumbled down of itself.

In a word, we need not wonder that Archbishop Spotfwood should so sadly lament the miserable state of the church at the period we are now come to: When even Hector Boece, who lived at the Spot. b. ii.

time, p. 60.

LETTER time, and wished well enough to the Papal cause. XXVIII. describes the Prelates in his days as * " devour-" ing the poor plundered people, doing nothing "that becomes good and worthy men, yea striv-" ing all they can to keep down all kind of li-" terature, lest if the people should come to a 66 better taste, they themselves should be obliged " to change their scandalous way of life, and "thereby lose their prey out of their hands: Let -"those whose business it is, see to a reformation. " of these things: It is the just grief and deep " feeling I have of fuch abuses that has drivers " me to this admonition." If the honest Principal of the King's College had lived but a few years longer, he would have feen "a reforma-"tion of these things" taken in hand by those whose business, in his opinion, it was not, where they whose business it was, would do nothing im-But what part a man, who could express himself as he does, would have acted in that in tricate scene we cannot positively say, and I shal not pretend to guess.

I shall conclude this letter, as the Abbé Fleury does one of his elaborate discourses upon this subject, with observing that "the changes in the "discipline of the church for the last five or six hundred years were not brought in so much by the authority of Bishops and councils, as by negligence, ignorance and error, sounded on forged decretals, and on the false reasonings of the schoolmen." And I hope you will join me LETTER the pious wish that follows, "God grant we XXIX.

Boece, b.

^{* &}quot;Populum ambesum deglutientes, nihil reliqui bonis et dignis viris facientes, imo omni nisu omnibus literis obsistentes, ne si populus meliora sapere incipiant, ipsi vitia sua in apertum prodita deserre cogantur, et prædam e manibus amittant: "Ea ut emendentur viderint illi quorum interest curare, me dolor justus et pia commiseratio ut monerem huc arripuit."

Thay make a right use of the happiness we enjoy of being born in a more knowing age, and that, if we cannot bring back the antient discipline, we may at least esteem, revere, and restet it.

I am, &c.

LETTER XXIX.

of the Queen Mother——Contention about filling the Sees of St. Andrews and Aberdeen ——The Reformation in Germany carried on by Martin Luther and others——Brought into Scotland by Patrick Hamilton, Abbot of Ferne, who suffered for it——Various instances of Persecution on the same account——The Reformers abroad called Protestants.

THE late King, before he undertook the fatal expedition which led him to the field of Flowden, had provided, as he thought, for the peace of the Kingdom, by fettling the regency

LETTER of it on the Queen, while she should remain un-XXIX. married. But this fettlement was foon overturned by her marrying within a year, Archibald Earl of Angus, a young nobleman of great family and fgure, who had lately succeeded to his grandfather, and now by his marriage, pretended to some share of the publick management, if not on his own, at least on his royal consort's account. However the states committed the regency to John Duke of Albany, the late King's cousin german, who by his education in France, and marriage with a rich lady of that nation, was warmly attached to the French interest, and in consequence of that attachment, involved in difficulties which clogged the motions of his administration all the time it continued.

The first ecclesiastical transaction of a publick spotswood, nature which he was concerned in, was the difposal of the See of St. Andrews, vacant by the death of the nominal Archbishop, who was slain with the King his father at Flowden. For this place of honour and profit there appeared no fewer than three competitors. Gavin Douglas Bishop of Dunkeld and uncle to the Earl of Angus, depended on his family-connexions and the Queen's influence for his promotion to it, and in confidence of this support took possession of the castle of St. Andrews. John Hepburn, Prior of St. Andrews, a factious turbulent man, got himself elected by the Canons, and by virtue of that election expelled the Bishop of Dunkeld's fervants, and fortified the house with a garrison of foldiers. Andrew Forman Bishop of Moray, the third Claimant, had procured a gift of the place from Pope Julius II. with the title of Legate 4 latere, and was supported in his pretensions by the Lord Hume, who coming to Edinburgh on purpole, pose, proclaimed the Pope's gift, and Forman's LETTER egation with great folemnity. So that in this con- XXIX. test were engaged all the three methods by which uch high dignities and benefices had ever been difposed of, royal presentation, canonical election. md papal provision. And the controversy was managed not in the old and proper way of ecclefiaftical and fynodical confultation, but by the lately introduced methods of violence and uproar, and of secular interference on all sides. Indeed the Bishop of Dunkeld soon relinquished his claim, and withdrew from the contention: * But the other two rivals kept it up with much keenness and unbecoming eagerness for several years.

Nor was this the only dispute of the kind that agitated our churchmen, at this time. The diocese of Aberdeen had now lost its incomparable Bishop Elphinston, and his place was contended for by no fewer than three potent rivals also. Earl of Huntly, by his authority in these parts had Spot.p. 106. compelled the Canons to give their votes to his coufin Alexander Gordon, who was at that time chantor of Moray; Albany the Regent had given a presentation to it in favour of a brother of the powerful house of Ogilvy: And at Rome Robert Forman, Dean of Glasgow and brother to the Legate, obtained a gift of it from Pope Leo X. who had succeeded Julius II. Here was another scene of disturbance like to open. But the Regent, by the authority of office, and a mixture of worldly

He appears to have been a worthy man, and his memory is famous to this day, as for many other laudable qualities, so in particular for his rare talent in poetry, of which his accurate and almost literal translation of Virgil's Æneid into the then current language of the country, is, and will remain an ample teftimony.

policy

LETTER policy, which even Bishop Leslie's personal regard XXIX. for Albany cannot altogeather vindicate, was lucky enough to adjust matters at last to the outward satisfaction of all parties. Andrew Forman got the Archbishoprick of St. Andrews, on condition of paying to John Hepburn three thousand crowns a year during life, and of prevailing with his brother Robert to quit his pretensions to Aberdeen. The Earl of Huntly's friend carried his point, and the Regent's presentee was content to put up with the Abbacy of Dryburgh. How far these fettlements, founded entirely on worldly confiderations, were agreeable to the maxims of the golpel, or could tend to advance the real interests of the church as a spiritual society, needs be no question to such as are in the least acquainted with the nature of it's original institution, and the fuccessive propagation of the gospel thro' the primitive and uncorrupted ages. And I have taken this particular notice of these, and such like deviations from the old standard among the many instances of the kind to be met with about this time, on purpose to abate a little of the wonder at, if not to account for, the strange and unexpected alteration which had been hatching for fome centuries, and now in a short time broke out with such a shock as had almost overturned, and did in effect shake the pillars of, that stupenduous fabrick of worldly grandeur which churchmen had with indefatigable application been rearing for many a-

We have feen what a flame Wickliff had raifed in England, where altho' his tenets, whether erroneous or not, were attacked and in a great measure born down by the unscriptural arguments of fire and fagget, yet thro' the negligence of the watchmen, who instead of taking care to prevent LETTER the fowing of what they thought tares, were XXIX. struggling and tearing one another about pomp and preferments, they spread and gained ground every day, and forced themselves over to the continent, as far as Bohemia. There indeed thev feem to have taken deep root, and were able to keep their hold, in spite of all the cruelties and unchristian breach of faith that their great propagator met with, from some treacherous hand or other, at the council of Constance. Yet all this time, except in Bohemia, they were driven to and made their appearance only in private corners, unfupported and almost unnoticed, without obtaining the countenance, or in any great degree alarming the fears of the mighty ones either in church or state. It might have been thought that if these new doctrines, as they were called, which Wickliff, Huss, and others were bold enough toadvance, had been fo destructive of religion, and contrary to the primitive creeds, as the champions of the Papal church would make us believe, they ought to have been suppressed by the old primitive method of scripture and argument, and the never failing appeal to "quod femper, quod " ubique, quod ab omnibus," to antiquity, universality, and consent. But instead of this, in all the councils either provincial or general, as they were called, on these occasions, we meet with nothing but a few magisterial threats from those in power to the prefumed heretics, like what the Jewish Sanhedrim issued to the Apostles, not to fpeak or preach any more after that fort; and when that would not do, they were delivered over to the fecular arm to be burnt, when they could not be answered. The great object of all the

J.FTTER councils that had been held for more than fix XXIX. hundred years, was either to exalt the Bishop of Rome above his fellow Bishops, or to contend with Kings, and claim exemption from civil obedience, or to harafs the poor uninstructed people with rigorous injunctions and superstitious obfervances, which had no connection with purity of faith or integrity of manners. things were come to fuch a pass, it was no wonder that opportunity was taken either to revive old truths, or to broach new errors in what was still looked upon to be the church of Christ.

Accordingly, about this time, while the Popes, who had long assumed an absolute sovereignty over all ranks and degrees, were disputing their pretensions with crowned heads, and the other Bishops scheming and soliciting for new titles and precedencies, a combustion broke out in Germany, which, from an almost imperceptible beginning, foon engrossed the attention of Popes and Bishops, of Kings, and Emperors, of all characters and denominations in the Western world: And what neither the parson of Lutterworth in England, nor the Principal of the university of Prague in Bohemia, could bring about, an obscure Augustinian Monk of Wittemberg in Saxony was the weak, but successful, instrument of effectuating, and, by unwearied perseverance, under the protection of some and opposition of others, laid the foundation of that remarkable change in the ecclesiastical system which has ever since been called the Reformation. This person was the renowned Martin Luther, fo much admired by friends, and reproached by enemies, who about the year 1517 took occasion, from the indulgences which the extravagance and diffipation of e Pope Leo X. had driven him to the neces-LETTER y of making fale of, for relieving his debts, to XXIX. veigh at first in his cloyster, and afterwards hen challenged in the way of public disputation, rainst that scandalous traffick which was cerinly a nuisance to all good men, and was as urtful to the fouls as it was detrimental to the urses of the filly people that trusted to it. Uner the primitive discipline indeed, the Bishops metimes, and after mature deliberation, thought t to relax fomewhat of the feverity of penance, s particular circumstances, and the health or isposition of the penitent required: Which reexation began to be called in the Latin church adulgentia, Indulgence or favour, and was grantd but feldom, and then too without any compotion or pecuniary acknowledgment whatever. lut by degrees the Popes, who were always graspng at every opportunity to enlarge their power nd fill their coffers, took the fole management of his episcopal privilege into their own hands, and y felling pardons not only for past, but even for uture transgressions, carried it at last to that horid pitch of licentiousness which in end proved its lownfal.

It has been faid, I know, that Luther's origiial quarrel at this time was not fo much with the offensiveness of these papal indulgences in themelves, as on account of the Pope's having entrusted he Dominicans with the distribution of them thro' Germany, which had hitherto been a perquifite, and a lucrative one too, of Luther's own order of Augustinians, and that for this reason it was that ne appeared so keenly against them. But in answer ' o this it may be observed, that, whether this paricular handle had been given or not, as it was foolish in such a shameful affair to give any new handle 2 H h

XXIX. were now fo multiplied, and avowed with such a boldness of oppressive effrontery, that it is more than probable some man of spirit in some place or other would have appeared against them, and laid hold of the first favourable occasion to begin the long wished-for and often attempted alteration. Be in this what will, it is certain that the attack made by Luther upon these indulgences, from whatever motives, and with whatever views, was the main introduction to all that followed. The Dominicans, who were now in possession of this advantageous merchandize, took the alarm, and as it might be expected, defended their privilege with a warmth of eloquence suitable to the object at stake. This produced replies from Luther's fide, which were answered with equal acrimony from the other. And here the affair seemed to rest for some time, till the Pope took the cause in hand, and made himself a party in the debate, summoning Luther to Rome to give an account of his tenets, and in case of his refusal or persisting in his obstinacy, threatning him with the severest pu-This irritated Luther, who was as renishments. folute for a Monk, as Leo was for a Pope, to such a degree that, after fundry fruitless interviews with the Pope's agents in Germany, and finding himself likely to be supported by some of the secular Princes, particularly by the Elector of Saxony, a man of great piety and worth, he retracted all his former professions of submission to the Pope's authority, openly renounced his infallibility, and formally appealed from him to a general council.

Thus was the challenge fairly given, and the Pope and Luther were now stated as principals in this important controversy. Nor was Luther single the arduous undertaking. For no sooner had LETTER : broken the ice, than numbers of learned men, XXIX. ho feemed only to be waiting for fuch an openg, joined him in different parts of the country, id appeared briskly in the same field with him: ich as Carolostadius, Osiander, Melanchthon, id Bucer in Germany, Zuinglius and Oecolamidius in Switzerland, and many others of less te here and there, who, though in some partiilar fentiments they differed from Luther, and eier fell below, or rose above his pitch in a few octrinal points, yet all concurred in the grand tack upon the Papal corruptions, and contributtheir feveral shares, tho' in different ways, and ith different consequences, towards the intended Yet it is worthy of notice, that eformation. uther has among friends the whole glory, and nong enemies bears the whole odium of the work, id that, notwithstanding of the assistance he had om his predecessors Wickliss and Huss, and from any of his cotemporaries, men of as great persoil talents and as much figure in the church as mfelf, he is still called the Apostle of Germany. mention this however, not to derogate from his aife, but only to regulate in some measure whatver use may be made of his name, either for apoving or condemning the business in which he as only a partner. And I have given this short count of his first appearance upon what may be illed the ecclesiastical stage, because it coincides ith the æra of our own history now before us. he farther progress of his and his brethrens eneavours I shall have frequent occasion to consider, nd to point out their influence on the affairs of ur own nation.

We have feen that in the late King's time, and before

LETTER before Luther was heard of, the very tenets which

XXIX. he espoused were maintained in our own country, and that numbers of people in Kyle and Cuningham, among whom were fundry gentlemen of family and fortune, were convened before Blackader the new Archbishop of Glasgow, for rejecting the adoration of images and relicks, the invocation of faints, the doctrine of transubstantiation and purgatory, the supremacy of the Pope and the forced celibacy of the clergy, with some other articles of less note and worse aspect, which seem to have been foisted into the catalogue by their accusers, as is generally the case, to swell the libel, and throw the more odium upon the pannels. However at that time there was nothing done in the profecttion, not on account of the infignificancy of the charge itself, or of the parties concerned in it, but either from the good nature of the Archbishop, or because the King, without whose aid the spiritual judgments were then thought of little efficacy, had not been willing to have things pushed to extremity. But now a more favourable prospect was beginning to open. The authority of civil government was not much to be feared. The Regent Albany was much out of the kingdom, carrying on his projects in France, and when at home, the a man of great prudence and capacity, was so difgusted at the thwarting of his measures by the Queen mother and her faction, who took part with her brother the King of England against the French interest, that he gave up his office, and took a farewell of Scotland for ever. The young King himself had been all along tost like a tennis ball between the two powerful families of Angus and Arran and their adherents, and had been advised, when little more than twelve years of age, to take hold of Albany's absence, and assume the LETTER administration of affairs into his own hands.

This was a lucky juncture for all who had any ov-ends of their own to ferve, and it was made ise of accordingly. The King, who was a youth of bright parts and most promising talents, soon lisplayed a strong taste for profuseness and magnificence, not so much in his own person, as in he public management, and with a view to what night be properly called Royal Grandeur. exchequer was low, and the crown revenues but canty. And this, joined with his own inexperience and natural impetuolity of temper, laid him open to the designs of such as could allure him with the supply of his wants, or furnish him the means of gratifying any of his favourite wishes. The clergy, who were for the most part possessed of great wealth, readily laid hold on fuch a concurrence of circumstances, to baffle the schemes which they faw in agitation against their opulence and independence. Thus matters stood when James A D. 1524. V. took the reins of government into his own hands. The see of St. Andrews was now filled by James Beton, who had been removed from Glasgow to it on the death of Forman in the year 1522. Gavin Dunbar, the King's Preceptor, was promoted to Glasgow, and his uncle another Gavin Dunbar, Archdeacon of St. Andrews had fucceeded Bishop Gordon of Aberdeen.* These two

* It was this Bishop of Aberdeen who finished the Bridge upon Dee, which had been begun by Bishop Elphinston. He likewise built and endowed a Hospital, or Beadhouse near the Cathedral, for 12 poor old men, in the year 1532. It has been lately fold to the Proprietor of the adjacent ground : The venerable little building is now demolished, and the money paid for it applied to a limilar purpose.

Dunbars

LETTER Dunbars were men of great esteem, and have XXIX. a good character from most writers. The Archbishop of Glasgow, tho' shamefully misrepresented by Knox, is celebrated by Buchanan in a most elegant piece of Latin Poetry, equal to any of his admirable compositions in that language. But the other Archbishop Beton is variously spoken of, and our church historian Spotswood endeavours to foften any appearance of charge against him, by reckoning it his misfortune, that under the shadow of his authority many good men were put to death for the cause of religion, tho' he says, Hist. p. 62. 66 the man himself was neither violently set, " nor much folicitous, as it was thought, how " matters went in the church." The German doctrines were about this time brought into Scotland by a Patrick Hamilton, Abbot of Ferne in Rossshire, a young man of a good family, who in the course of his travels had contracted an acquaintance with Luther and Melanchthon, and from them imbibed the new opinions, which they were then propagating. At his return to his own country, he spared not, wheresoever he came, to Keith's Hist. p. 7. lay open the corruptions of the Romish church, and to shew the errors, both in doctrine and practice, that had crept into the christian religion.— In this employment he was both zealous and fuccessful, for he was a learned man, of a courteous disposition, and unblameable in his life and This alarmed the clergy, who unconversation. der colour of conferring with him, enticed him to St. Andrews where, after repeated disputation, in which some of the clergy seemed to be of his mind, he was one night suddenly apprehended in his bed, and carried prisoner to the castle is freewill can do any thing that is truly good.

The next day he was presented before the Arch-

. That no man is without fin altogether, fo long s he liveth. 4. That every true christian may now himself to be in a state of grace. 5. That man is not justified by works, but by faith nly. 6. That good works make not a good man. ut that a good man doeth good works, as it is he good tree which bringeth forth good fruit, ot the fruit that maketh the tree good. 7. That aith, hope, and charity are so linked together. hat he who hath one hath all, and he who lackth one 'lacketh all. 8. That remission of sin is tot purchased by any actual penance. 9. That uricular confession is not necessary to salvation. o. That there is no purgatory. 11. That the hoy Patriarchs were in heaven before Christ's rassion. 12. That the Pope is Antichrist, and hat every Priest has as much power as the Pope. n his defence he maintained the first seven of hese articles to be undoubtedly true, and sound loctrine, to which he would fet his hand. est, he said, were disputable points, but such s he could not condemn, unless he saw better easons than he had as yet heard. The consejuence was, he was delivered over to the fecular rm to fuffer the punishment due to herefy, and he same day, being the first of March 1527, was ournt at a stake at the gate of St. Salvator's colege. This unjust and precipitate execution made great noise thro' the kingdom. A general cla-

LETTER mour was raised against the churchmen for con-XXIX. demning a man, and such a man too, because he maintained doctrines, some of which they themfelves could not prove to be heretical, and others of them were proposed only as theological problems to be disputed among divines. Neither did this ill timed feverity answer their expectation. For foon after, the King's Confessor Alexander Seton a Dominican, being in course Lent-preacher that year at St. Andrews, and taking for his fubject the commandments of the law, did in his fermons infift upon these points, "that the law " of God is the only rule of duty; that if God's " law is not violated, no fin is committed; that "it is not in man's power to fatisfy for fin, and "that forgiveness of sin is no otherwise purchased but by unfeigned repentance, and true faith " apprehending the mercy of God in Christ." For this uncouth method of fermonizing, and fome other freedoms in describing the character of an Apostolic Bishop, while he purposely omitted to speak of purgatory, pilgrimage, praying to faints, merits and miracles, which were the ordinary themes of these days, he fell under Archbishop Beton's displeasure, and perceiving the King's countenance altered towards him by Beton's ill offices, he fled for safety to Berwick, from whence he wrote back to the King a pathetic letter of exposulation against the corruptions and cruelties of the clergy: But finding no favourable effects from this letter, after having staid a while at Berwick, he went to London, and became chaplain to the Duke of Suffolk, in which station he died. It was faid he recanted most of his peculiar opinions, but this the '

the man himself denied, and proved to be a false LETTER allegation. XXIX.

Not long after this, one Henry Forest a Benedictine was apprehended for faying, that Patrick Hamilton had died a martyr; and continuing in the justification of the man and his doctrines, he was condemned as an heretic, and publickly burnt at the North aile of the abbey. they were confulting about the manner and place of his execu ion, one John Lindsay, a plain simple man, who then ferved the Archbithop, advised to burn him in some hollow cellar, because, he faid, "the smoke of Mr. Patrick Hamilton had insee fected all on whom it blew." It might have been thought that this simple man's observation would have had some weight with those of deeper judgment and higher rank, who could not but remember what an old and comfortable adage it had been that, "fanguis martyrum fe-"men ecclesiæ," the blood of the martyrs was the feed of the church, and how unavailable these diabolical arguments had been to stop the growth of opinions which the powers of pagan Rome looked upon with as malignant an eye, as Papal Rome could do to the tenets of Martin Luther or Patrick Hamilton. And fo it happened in the present case: Such excessive rigours awakened people's curiofity, and put them upon inquiring into the truth of these so long unheardof doctrines, which led their acquaintances for chearfully to the stake: And this enquiry produced discoveries which they had been strangers to before, by which means the infection, as Lindfay called it, spread, and the more violent that the churchmen were in profecuting, the more objects they found for profecution. Sometimes 2 1 2 indeed

ILETTER indeed the King interfered, and either screened or XXIX. rescued the accused, according as application was made, or fancy or favour inclined him. But for the most part, care was taken to prevent access to him, or to seize the opportunity of his being absent on some of his frequent perambulations.—

So the poor people were harassed without mercy, and numbers of learned men chose to leave their native country, rather than be daily exposed to the sury of the Archbishop of St. Andrews, and his implacable instigators. Thus in the year 1534, Mr. Alexander Aless, Messrs. Fife, Macbee and Macdougal, being, on sufpicion, fummoned to the Bishop's court, and not thinking it fafe to appear, fled into England, where they were liberally entertained, and Aless in particular came into fuch favour with the King, that he was called the King's scholar. This man was born at Edinburgh in the year 1500, and was among the first of our countrymen who entered the lists against Luther, which was now the grand field of battle wherein all disputants, young and old, endeavoured to give proofs of their merit In the conferences with Mr. Hamilton he laboured strenuously to bring him back to the current faith, but instead of prevailing with him, he was shaken in his own belief by the force of Hamilton's reasonings, and especially by his constancy and courage at the stake. For some little time he wavered between the two religions, but at last he thoroughly embraced Lutheranism, and persevered in it till his death. While he was in England, he was admitted into the convocation in the year 1537, where he disputed with Stokelly Bishop of London, and maintained that there were but two facraments, properly and in a strict sense.

OF SCOTLAND.

In 1540 he left England, and went to Germany, LETTER where the Elector of Brandenburg made him Professor of Divinity at Francfort upon the Oder.-Here he held a public disputation on the question, "Whether the civil magistrate can and " ought to punish fornication," and maintained the affirmative with Melanchthon. But being disgusted at the remissions of the university in deciding upon the question, which he interpreted as a bias to the licentious fide, he gave up his Professorship in 1543, and tho' he had an invitation from Albert Duke of Prussia, to his newly erected university of Koningsberg, he chose to accept of the divinity chair at Leipsick in Saxony. While in this station he was employed to translate the first liturgy of Edward VI. into Latin, for Bucer's use, who did not understand English, and here he continued till 1565, when he died. He left feveral valuable treatifes behind him, and in general feems to have been a man of great repute for probity and learning.

Mr Macbee, commonly called Dr Maccabeus, another of these refugees, was much countenanced for some time by Shaxton Bishop of Salisbury, and on his leaving England, went first to Holland and then to Denmark, where he became chaplain to the King, and died in that service in 1550. The other two, Fife and Macdowal, after having staid some time in England, took shelter in Saxony likewise, where Fife held a Professorship some years at Leipfick, and came back an old man to his own country. But Macdowal rose to be a Burgomaser in one of their principal towns, and never reurned. These first reformers of ours, as we may now call them, were, we fee, all of the Lutheran model, which was the first draught of the reform-

LETTER ing scheme; and even Buchanan himself, in his XXIX. accounts of these times, plainly calls it Lutheranism that the new believers were accused of. It is true that, some years before this, the partizans of Luther, who by this time were become both numerous and powerful, had in a joint body and wit In A.D. 1529. all requisite formality protested against an impetial edict passed at Spires by the Emperor's deputy Ferdinand, which they conceived to be injunrious to their civil and religious liberties, and an encroachment upon their privileges, both as christians, and as constituent members of the Germanic body. And from this deed of Protest it is, that the Lutherans now began among themfelves to be distinguished by that title, which all dissenters from the Romish church by degrees assumed, and to this day glory in the comprehending name of Protestants. But at the time I am speaking of, this title had not reached our country, tho' the Lutheran principles had; and it was only these principles that our separatists from the established church then knew. The , use and application of this observation will appear as we go along, when we come in course to take a view of a fubfiquent plan of reformation, almost as different from Luther's, as Luther's was from Rome.

Mean time I am &c,

LETTER

LETTER XXX.

L E T T E R XXX.

State of Ecclesiastical Affairs in England——
Henry VIII. throws off the Pope's Supremacy, and is acknowledged as Head of the English Church——Tendency in Scotland towards Reformation——Prevented by the Clergy's Influence with the King, and by the Zeal of Cardinal Beton——Death of James V.——Proceedings of the Protestants in Germany——Account of John Calvin, and his Model of a Church at Geneva——Of Ignatius Loyola, and his Institution of the orader of Jesuits.

In the preceding letter, I have taken notice of fome of our religious refugees meeting with protection in England, from which it would appear that their opinions began to be more openly countenanced there, than at home. The reason of this, it will be proper that we enquire into, and take

LETTER: take a short view of ecclesiastical affairs in the XXX., neighbouring kingdom, in order to throw some more light on those of our own. The sceptre of England was at this time fwayed by Henry VIII. uncle by the mother's fide to our King. He was a younger son, and had been bred by his father Henry VII. with a view to the church, by which means, being endued with great natural parts, he had early acquired more infight than is usual for a Prince, into the dogmatical points of religion, which were then the chief study of all that expected preferment in that way. But his elder brother Arthur dying within a few months after his marriage with the Princess Catherine of Arragon, and the father who was a money-loving man, not inclining to refund the large portion which Catherine had brought with her, the young Henry, now Prince of Wales, and scarce fifteen years of age, was forced by his father, much against his own inclination, as is univerfally acknowledged, to marry the widow Princess, and succeed his brother in his bed, as he was like to do to his crown. To bring about this political match, which for the novelty of it among christians could not be but much scrupled at, a dispensation was thought absolutely necessary, and accordingly was procured from Pope Julius II. at an adequate price. In the year 1509 Henry afcended the throne, and even then expressed some uneafiness about the validity of his marriage, till his counsellors made him sensible how requisite it was for the convenience of his affairs to ratify and adhere to it.

> When Luther's opinions began to make a noise, Henry entered the lists against him, and wrote on the Pope's side with great virulence, and with as much appearance of argument as the cause would bear, for which piece of service Leo honoured LETTER him with the title of Defender of the Faith, which XXX. his fuccessors retain to this day. But Luther was not the man to be frightened by this royal attack, or to let flip fuch a noble opportunity of displaying his talents for disputation. He wrote to Henry in a style of great freedom, and, as even his friends complained, with more afperity of language than was necessary for his cause, or suitable to the dignity of his opponent. However Henry was not si-He replied to Luther with greater bitterness than before, and at the same time wrote to the elector of Saxony to drive Luther out of his dominions, and quell these pernicious heresies, by all the means that God had put in his power. This paper war continued four years, from 1521 to 1525, and shews Henry's ability in these matters, whatever politicians may think of his prudence in stooping to a controversy of this kind. the attention he had paid to it, might have opened his eyes to fee abfurdities where he had not feen any before, is at least highly probable, as it was the case with many others of lower rank, who were engaged in this controversy. But however this may be, we are certain, that within a few years after this contest, Henry began to entertain scruples about the lawfulness of his marriage with his brother's widow. His first application on this head Collier: was to his own Bishops and clergy, who all, except Fisher Bishop of Rochester, unanimously declared under their hands and feals that they deemed the King's marriage unlawful. Indeed when it was debated in council on his accession, Warham Archbishop of Canterbury strenuously opposed it, as being incestuous, contrary to the law of God, and consequently not to be dispensed with; while

LETTER on the other hand, Fox Bishop of Winchester in-XXX. fifted on the Pope's authority as sufficient to render the dispensation valid, and like a true politician added fuch other reasons of state as at that time were decisive. Notwithstanding of this concurrence of opinion from his own clergy in his - favour, Henry finding that Catharine stood stiff to her title of Queen, resolved to apply to Pope A.D. 1527, Clement VII. and accordingly fent Knight his fecretary to move his fuit in the court of Rome, and obtain a divorce. The Pope, being at that time the Emperor's prisoner, was willing to make a friend of Henry, and gave his envoy as favourable an answer as he could desire. But foon after, on a lucky turn in his affairs, he artfully delayed the performance of what he had promised for some time, till on the King's repeated importunities he at last granted a commission to Cardinal Wolfey the King's favourite, in conjunction with the Archbishop of Canterbury, or any other English Prelate, to examine into the affair, giving at the same time a provisional dispensation for the King's marrying any other person, and promising to expedite a decretal Bull for annulling his marriage with Catharine. When these proceedings came to the Emperor's ears, who was Catharine's nephew, he fo wrought upon the Pope by menacs at one time, and fair proffers of friendship at another, that nothing was done to purpose in the bufiness, after all the lengths that had been gone in the King's favour. So he was obliged to dilpatch new agents to Rome, of whom Garding the afterwards famous Bishop of Winchester, was one, to bring the matter to a conclusion one way or other. On which the Pope in May 1529 issued a new commission to one of his own Cardinals Campegio, along with Wolsey to take cognizance

of

of the cause, but reserving the final determination LETTER to himself in consistory. Accordingly Campegio XXX. came to England, and he and Wolsey called the King and Catharine before them. At this meeting Catharine maintained the lawfulness and indissolubleness of her matrimonial union with Henry, which had now subsisted twenty years, and having been taught her lesson by the Emperor and Pope both, she protested against any decision of that court, and appealed to Rome: Then rifing up, she made a low reverence to the King, left. the court, and would no more appear in it. trial was defignedly spun out till July, and then the Pope, having fettled matters with the Emperor, laid hold on Catharine's appeal, suspended the commission of the Legates, recalled the cause to Rome, and fent private orders to Campegio to burn the Bull of dissolution, with which he was intrusted. When the accounts of this came to England in October, it put an end to all the hopes which the King had so anxiously cherished, and effected the ruin of Wolsey, whose ungrateful fluffling and infidelity in the business, the King had discovered, and could not forgive.

Being thus disappointed in his expectations from the Pope, who had so long played fast and loose with him, the next step which Henry took was, on a hint started by Dr Thomas Cranmer, sellow of Jesus college in Gambridge, to consult the several most famous universities in Europe on the subject, who all, in concurrence with numbers of learned divines, gave it as their judgment that Henry's marriage with his rother's widow was contrary to the law of God, and therefore not to be dispensed with, by any human authority. When Clement heard of this, being still under the LETTER the Emperor's influence, he summoned Henry to XXX. appear, either in person or by proxy, before his ribunal at Rome. But the King, having fensibly experienced the iniquity of that court, and looking on this citation as a high infult on the dignity of his crown, was now determined to be deluded no longer: And having called a convocation of his own clergy in 1532, he got a sentence pronounced by them, declaring his marriage with Catharine contrary to the law of God, and therefore null and of no force. About this time Archbishop Warham died, and was succeeded by Dr. Cranmer upon the King's presentation, and with the Pope's confent, who fent him the usual Bulls for consecration: And now, to finish this long contended process, the new Archbishop, assisted by Bishop Gardiner and others, proceeded to a judicial dissolution of the marriage with Catharine, and pronounced a divorce between the King and her on the 23d of May 1533. After which the was treated only as Princess Dowager of Wales, and lived privately at Kimbolton, where she died three years after this, in the fiftieth year of her age.

> I have dwelt the longer on this affair of Henry VIII. because, however foreign it may seem to my main design, it was an introduction to the religious intercourse which we now see beginning to open between the two nations; and as it is thought to have paved the way for the reformation in both countries, has therefore been represented by Popish writers in the most odious light. The character of Catharine has been urged to confirm the justice of her claim. She is faid to have been a most pious and virtuous woman, and by Henry's own confession to have been one of the best of wives; all which may be allowed, and yet without LETTER any injury to her character, her infilting fo stifly XXX. on her title may be supposed to have been owing as much to a willingness to serve her nephew's ambitious views, or to a superstitious reverence for every decision of the Papal oracle, which she believed infallible, as to any real inward conviction of the King's injustice in endeavouring to annul it. But the great topic of scandal against Henry in this affair is his attachment to Ann Bullen, whom we are told, he had fet his affections upon, and therefore wished to get rid of Catharine, to make room for this new connection. And yet it is certain, from the history of Ann Bullen's life, that, however much he was attached to her when he faw her, he had declared his fcruples, and begun the process, some years before he could have seen So that whatever influence she might that lady. have had over him to hasten the divorce, which yet was a work of fix years agitation, and not hurried with the precipitancy usual in such criminal cases, neither he nor she can be charged with unlawful defires, as the cause of beginning the pro-But whatever may be faid for or against the other parties, how is the Pope, that dernier judge, as fome suppose, of right and wrong, to be justified for his conduct all the time that the plea was depending? If he knew it to be unjust, why did he not speak out at first, and peremptorily forbid any application on that score? On the other hand, if he thought Henry's proposals equitable, as he frequently gave him ground to believe that he did, might he not have humoured him with a good grace, as had been done by his predecessors before, and has been done by his fuccessors since,

LETTER on occasions not a whit more plausible than the present?* Upon the whole, it is not a little fur-days, of the same condescension that he was now a petitioner for. In 1490 Beatrix of Naples and Queen Dowager of Hungary, had married Ladislaus, son of Casimir King of Poland, who by virtue of that marriage got possession of the Hungarian throne: And yet within ten years, Ladislaus growing weary of her, applied for a divorce to Pope Alexander VI. who, in full confitory, pronounced a sentence, declaring that, notwithstanding of the answers and protests of the Ambassadors of Naples, the marriage between Ladislaus and Beatrix was mill and void, and commanding Beatrix to keep a perpetual filence, and pay a fine of 25000 ducats belides. The other instance was nearer Henry's own doors, and undoubtedly within his knowledge. Lewis XII. of France, had when Duke of Orleans been married to Jean of France, fister to his predecessor Charles VIII. and had cohabited with her ten or twelve years: But upon his coming to the crown as collateral heir in 1498, having no children by his wife, and being desirous of getting possession of the dutchy of Breague which belonged in heritage to the Queen Dowager Ann his brother-in-law's widow, application was made to the Pope A-lexander, who, by the perfusion of Cardinal d'Amboile the King's prime minister, a more faithful servant to Lewis than Wolfey in a like business was to Henry, and upon promise of a handsome pension to the Pope's son Czefar Borgia, divorced Lewis from Jean without assigning any reason, and authorised him to marry the Dowager Queen, which he accordingly did. Here were two examples for Henry to have pled as a King, and Clement to have followed as a Pope. Only it would feem, from Henry's bad fuccess, that he had either forgot or neglected the powerful argument of money, which Lewis had to fuch good jurpose made use of, and trusted too much to the equity of his suit and weight of his own influence. However it appears the consequences of denying his request had taught the Popes in aftertimes to be more cautious how they dealt with crowned heads in marriage-matters. For towards the end of the century we are engaged in, the then Pope Clement VIII. without any helitation formally dissolved the marriage of Henry IV. of France with Margaret of Valois, tho' it had been as formally confirmed and all obstacles dispensed with by Gregory XIII. and the King married Mary of Medicis, Clement's niece, which was another prizing that there should have been such a strange LETTER bustle about this step of Henry VIII. as if it had XXX. been so detestable in itself, or so unprecedented in practice. Protestant writers, before they can confistently condemn it, should acknowledge that marrying a brother's widow is allowable by the law of God, or, if not, that it may be made lawful by the Pope's authority, which ought not to be called in question: And papists would do well to remember how many favours of that kind have been granted by their Popes on as slender grounds, and to as undeferving persons as in the present case; so that if divorces, at any time and in any circumstances, be lawful, with liberty to the petitioning party to marry again, it will not be easy to show cause why the Defender of the Popish Faith might not have been gratified in his even alledged scruples as well as others: If otherwise, let these casuists take their own divorcing Popes into the reckoning with the rebellious Henry, and pass what sentence they please upon both.

* There had been two late instances, even in Henry's own

But the truth is, it is not so much the divorce it-felf, whether just or unjust, as the unwelcome doings that attended it and followed upon it, which have raised that dreadful storm of obloquy against Henry from the Romish quarter. The Pope was both artful and timid, willing enough to gain or secure friends by dissimulation, but afraid of creating enemies by any open and decisive measure. Henry on the other hand was plain and determined in his purposes, one who stood much upon the dignity of his character, and the prerogatives of his crown. With these dispositions, when he found what a game

favourable circumstance that Henry of England had not thought of, or was not lucky enough to have in his power.

LETTER game the court of Rome was intending to play in a XXX. business, where he could not but think he had a good right to be indulged as other monarchs had been, he began, even before the final rupture, to exert some part of his royal authority, and to let the Pope and his partizans fee betimes what he could and would do, if he was provoked. Thus in the year 1530 he stretched the act of præmunire, which had been passed in former reigns, to such a length against the Bishops, for procuring bulls from Rome,

Collier, b. i. p. 61. that they were obliged to come to a composition, and to pay a hundred thousand pounds of fine. About the fame time he called a parliament and a convocation, and got himself to be acknowledged by both as Sole Protector and Supreme Head of the church of England. Yet this convocation had not thrown off their former connexion with the Pope, as appears from their dating all their publick deeds in such and such a year " of the pontificate of " our most holy Father and Lord, Clement by di-" vine providence Pope, of that name the feventh," 'tho' in the body of these deeds, after bestowing high panegyrics on their most excellent and illustrious King and Lord Henry, for so valiantly defending the church both by his fword and pen against the Lutheran hereticks, they "recognosce "his Majesty to be the singular Protector, the " only and supreme Lord, and as far as is consi-" stent with the law of Christ, even the supreme "Head of the church of England." And the Tonstal Bishop of Durham entered a humble protest against this title, his scruples seem to have been not so much against the matter as the form of it, especially in the expression "quantum per Christi " legem licet, as far as is lawful by, or confistent " with, the law of Christ," which he was afraid tralignants might take in an affirmative and uni-LETTER versal sense, tho' in a limiting or restrictive sense XXX. are had no objection to it.

It was a Popish Convocation, therefore, at least not a Protestant one, which first passed this offenlive compliment to the King of England: And whatever force of argument may be pertinently brought against the found of it, by the lovers of primitive antiquity, one should think the Romanists had least reason of any to object to, or cry out against it. The Pope himself, some few years before this, had dubbed this same Henry, Defender of the Faith: And was not this in some fort paving the way for what followed? For who was so proper to defend the faith of the church as her Head? Or who so proper to be her Head, as fuch an eminent Defender of her Faith? The Popes themselves had long assumed the title of Headship, and in that character had declared it to be, and claimed it as, their peculiar privilege, to defend the faith of the church by the paramount authority of their See, and by this claim they had established a kind of synonymy or identity between the two terms. And might not one of Henry's disposition, when a Pope had flattered him with one of his peculiar titles, be thereby led to think, that he had a right to the other also? That none but Christ can be Head of Christ's Church, is not only ascertained by scripture and an established maxim of religion, but even flows from the very found of the expression: And in the strict sense, neither Pope nor King, indeed no created being, can pretend to it. But there have been so many distinctions brought in, and so many foreign additions tacked to the word Church, as have quite confused the pure and primitive notion of it, and 2 L

73

LETTER made it possible to impugn or justify any or all of XXX. the many various definitions that have been made use of on this subject. Of this fort is that current division of the things of the church into Spiritual and Temporals, which Bishop Tonstal in his protestation takes notice of, where he says, that " in one fense, if temporal and earthly "things be understood, the King may, consistently with the law of Christ, be supreme "Head, as being above all, and having no suee perior: But, if spirituals be understood, the "King may not be the supreme Head of the "church, because that is not consistent with the law of Christ." This has always been esteemed an irrefragable argument, and a sufficient solution of all the difficulties, in which this matter is involved; and yet, when duly examined; there is not perhaps so much strength or weight in it, as at first fight it may be thought to bear. For, in strict propriety of speech, the church has no temporals: "My kingdom is not of this world," excludes any fuch pretention. She is always faid to be a spiritual society, instituted for spiritual purposes, and governed by spiritual laws, under her divine and infallible Head, JESUS CHRIST. And what temporal things her fervants or minifters of any rank stand in need of, or are furnished with, for their temporal sustenance, are only adventitious donations, and so far from being essential to her constitution, that they are many times, and in many cases, an incumbrance upon What is purely spiritual, therefore, about the church, and all that is truly to be called the church is fo, no King that I know of, not even the over-bearing Henry VIII. ever pretended to. But when, what did not belong to her as church, came came to be so blended into her frame as to make LETTER a very material part of her description, so very XXX. material indeed, that temporals were thought as effential an ingredient in her composition as spirituals, it was no wonder that temporal powers claimed a Headship over a body made up of such opposite and incoherent mixtures. And was not this too much the case at the period we are now looking backto? What was it that was then generally called the church, and so warmly stood up for as such? Was it not the possessions and temporalities, the lands and lordships, which her servants were enriched or rather burthened with? And was it not always a principal article of accufation against the different hereticks, as they were called, of those days, that they had the impudence to maintain, "that the church ought to have no temporals?" I do not mean to fasten this incongruity as a peculiar tenet upon the Popish church, either then or now: I know well enough, it is a darling notion with all churches, at least in these western parts, " a leaven indeed that leaveneth the whole lump." And however much I may be ridiculed for it, I cannot help regretting, and almost pitying, many able writers, who argue very fluently, and with great strength of demonstration, for the independence of the church upon the state, when I fee them so very much straitened how to reconcile this favourite notion with that independence. What views Henry might have had in demanding, or what these Popish Bishops might have meant by giving him, that heterogeneous title, is none of our concerns. Only though, in my own fense of the church, I am far from approving it in any mortal man whatever, yet, in consequence of the then prevailing, and still current, description of 2 L 2

LETTER that fociety, as established by, and incorporated XXX. into the state, I do not see why Henry VIII. or any other sovereign, in his own dominions, may not bear the title, as it now stands, and be the Head of the Lords Spiritual as well as of the Temporal.

But to proceed: When intelligence was conveyed to Rome, that Henry had divorced Catharine, and married Anne Bullen, the whole Conclave was in an uproar, and the Imperial Cardinals urged the Pope to extremities. Accordingly, a Confistory was held, and a sentence published, March the twenty third 1534, declaring Henry's marriage with Catharine firm and valid, and ordering him, under pain of final excommunication, to take her again as his lawful wife. Nor was Henry idle at home. His next step brought the clergy, after many tergiversations and foftenings, to pass the famous act of submission in 1534. payments to the Pope were now discharged, appeals to him prohibited, under fevere penalties, and all his bulls, provisions, and dispensations, utterly abolished. In short, the whole of the papal authority was entirely suppressed, and an oath imposed upon the clergy, to balance their former oaths of obedience to the Pope, afferting the King to be the Supreme Head of the Church of England, and that the Bishop of Rome has no more jurisdiction than any other Bishop.

Thus matters stood in England, when the Scotsmen I spoke of, sled to it for refuge from the papal persecution at home, the for other reasons, as we shall see afterwards, they did not long find that safety in it which they expected. Meantime, the inquisition went on in Scotland, and numbers of both sexes were cited before the ecclesiastical courts upon the score of herefy, of whom some LETTER recanted, and many fuffered. About this time XXX. too, the King had a contest with the Bishops about the institution of the College of Justice, which he was now projecting, and for the support of it, proposed to lay a tax upon the Prelates. taxing the clergy was deemed a matter of spiritual cognizance, appeal was made to Rome, and Bishop Dunbar of Aberdeen was dispatched to manage the cause there. The affair, however, was at last adjusted by an agreement, on these terms, Spot. p.68. that the Senate should consist of Fourteen Ordinaries, with a President, seven of the spiritualty and seven of the temporalty, the President being always of the spiritual estate, and a Prelate constituted in dignity.* There are extant, two bulls, or indults as they are called, of the Popes, in favour of this institution. The first is from Clement VII. in 1531, granting liberty to the King to raise ten thousand ducats from the clergy for that purpose, but with this superfluous proviso, that this indult was to be of force " only while the faid " James, and his fucceffors, continued in the " faith, obedience, and devotion of the Aposto-

courts

" lic

Buchanan, in his account of this inflitution, about forty years after, fays, that "tho' at first many plausible steps were taken for the equitable administration of justice, yet people's expectations were not answered, and it was thought an unsurrentable stretch of prerogative, thus to commit the disposal of people's property to the sole arbitrement of fifteen men, whose power," he says, "was perpetual, and their government the next thing to tyranny." The experience of two hundred years, since Buchanan wrote, is the best proof what soundation there is for, or justice in, his censure. The design was certainly praise-worthy, and the continuance of it, thro' so many changes and revolutions, demonstrates the public sense of its usefulness.

LETTER " lic See." His Holiness, it seems, did not re-XXX. flect, that if ever that obedience should be thrown off, as it foon was, the confent of the apostolic See would not be asked for such an imposition, as indeed in money-matters it can never be proved to have been necessary. The other bull is from Paul III. in 1535, modifying the above fum to "fourteen hundred pounds of the usual money " of Scotland, making three hundred and fifty " pounds sterling, or thereby," which, by the bye, shews the proportion between the two currencies at that time. Besides this, the same Pope had, the year before, on his entry to the Pontisicate, complimented the King, during his life, with a year's revenue of all the churches and monasteries within the kingdom, that were in the crown's gift, as they feverally should fall vacant.

These kindnesses, it is thought, influenced the King to give way so easily to the prosecutions, which were carried on with fuch rigour against the new doctrines, and to shew his gratitude, by enforcing the old penal laws, and enacting new ones, in support of the papal power. To this purpose, in the Parliament 1535, an act passed, " ratifying and approving the statute made by his "highness, in his Parliament 1525, against them "that hold, dispute, or rehearse the damnable " opinions of the great Heretic Luther, his dif-"ciples and followers." And another of the fame date, against them "that sustain the pro-" cess of cursing," that is, lie under the church's censure, without giving satisfaction by the space of forty days: Yea, fo zealous was the King this way, that to discourage the holding of conventions for disputing on the scriptures, rewards were offered to any who would discover such conventions. tions, and inform against the Heretics: And to LETTER fecure the old subjection to the Pope, it was made XXX. death, and confiscation of goods, to argue against, or in the least impugn, his authority within the By orders of this Parliament too, a national council was held the next year, at Edin-A.D. 1536; burgh, by the Archbishop of St. Andrews, under the stale pretence of reformation of manners, and restoring of discipline, which it seems there was great need for at this time: For there is a statute extant, bearing, " that the unhonesty and mis-" rule of kirkmen, both in wit, knowledge, and "manners, is the cause that the kirk and kirk-" men are lightlied, and contemned; therefore the "King exhorts and prays all 'Archbishops, Bi-" shops, Ordinaries, and other Prelates, to re-46 form themselves, their obedientiars and kirk-"men under them, in habit and manners, to God " and man, and if any will not obey nor obtem-" per to their superior, the King's Grace shall "find remeid theirfor at the Pope's Holiness, &c." That the King had views of a reformation is acknowledged by historians; and we are told, that at one time he called some of the clergy to him, and ordered them to get them to their charges and reform their own lives, otherwise, says he "I vow

"to God, I shall reform you not by imprisonment as the King of Denmark does, nor as my uncle of England by heading and hanging, but I shall reprove you by sharp and severe punishments, &c." Whatever truth be in these private accounts, the above act of parliament is a publick declaration of the King's intentions, and shews how stagrant the misbehaviour of the clergy must have been, when a young man like him, not much above twenty four years of age, and not too rigidly

LETTER ly strict in his own conduct, took such offence at

XXX. it, and was obliged to push so vigourously for a reformation of it. At the same time his threatning to feek remeid from the Pope was not the likelieft method to obtain the proposed end, as it was the general complaint then, and had been for many years, not only among the Lutherans, but even over all Europe, that the Head needed reformation as much as the members. Yet the King's care in his station was in so far commendable, and if it had been seconded properly by those to whose hands fuch business officially lay, there had not been, in all probability, such a jumble of disorder and irregularity as broke out foon after his death. Indeed about this time he was in great esteem with the neighbouring Princes. The Pope fent him 2 confecrated cap and fword: The Emperor and King of France complimented him with the orders of their feveral Knighthoods: And his uncle Henry, who had offended the Emperor, and fallen under the Pope's displeasure, courted his friendship by repeated embassies and pressing solicitations. Twice he proposed an interview between them either at York or Newcastle, and made James most splendid offers to induce him to it. But the clergy, dreading the consequences of such a meeting, which they justly suspected might be prejudicial to their attachments, exerted all their influence to prevent it, and at last prevailed, by the never-failing argument of a confiderable gratuity in hand, and a promise of their whole revenues to be at his fervice, in case of any future exigencies. True it is, the behaviour of some of the English monarchs on fuch occasions, in former times, was not very encouraging to James to accept of this invitation, even from an uncle: And however generous inten-

Keith's Hift, b. i. p. 18.

entions Henry might really have had at this time, LETTER or his nephew's good, (as hitherto, even after XXX. his great victory at Flowden, he had acted towards his kingdom with a generofity that does honour o his memory,) or whatever politic views he night have had towards his own fecurity, it cannot be denied that the clergy had too good a nandle of these former instances, and could with great plausibility cover their main objection under uch a specious pretence.

The King was now in the flower of his age, and being the only hope of his family, he began to ook out for a proper match to preserve the suceffion in the right line, and in January 1537 maried Magdalen, daughter to Francis I. of France. This marriage, it is faid, alarmed the clergy not a ittle, as the lady had been bred under her aunt the then Queen of Navarre, who had imbibed some of the new doctrines, and was a great friend to the Protestants. But this alarm was not of long continuance. For Magdalen died in the July after, and the next year the King married Mary of Guise, the Duke of Longuevill's widow, which gave new life to the churchmen, from the known attachment of the family of Guise to the old forms. Another incident too in their favour was the death of the old Archbishop of St An-A.D. 15384. drews, and the advancement of his nephew, the famous Cardinal Beton, to the primacy, who was then in the prime of life, and whether more inclined or not, was in many respects more capable to quell the supposed enemies of the church than his old superannuated uncle had been.

The first act of the Cardinal after his promotion spots. 69 was a sufficient specimen of his intentions: For he was not well warmed in his seat, when to display

2 M

LETTER his grandeur he brought to St. Andrews a splen-XXX. did company of Earls and Lords, with five or fix Bishops, besides Abbots, and a number of Deans, Priors, and Doctors of divinity: Who being all convened in the cathedral, he began to hold forth the danger which the church was in, by the increase of hereticks, and the boldness with which they professed their opinions openly, even in the King's court, where, he faid, they found too great countenance. He particularly named Sir John Borthwick, whom he had cited to that diet for difperfing heretical books, and maintaining diverse articles contrary to the doctrines of the Romish church, desiring their assistance in the procedure of justice against him. The articles he was charged with were all of the old offensive cast, with the addition of this new one, that he faid " the herefies com-" monly called the herefies of England and their " new liturgy, were commendable and to be em-" braced of all christians, and that the church of "Scotland ought to be governed after the manner " of the English:" From which we may observe what an eye-fore the communion of the English church, even in that imperfect stage of reformation, was to the papal courts of those days. English martyrologist Fox, and our own historian Spotswood, give us a full account of the trial and accusation of this Sir John Borthwick. But Knox in his history, on purpose to keep this strong testimony in favour of the church of England out of fight, huddles up the whole process with a bare mention of his name amidst other lesser matters, contrary to that writer's custom in cases of a like When the accusation was read, Sir John was called upon for form's fake. But not appearing, the libel was held as confessed, and he denounced onfiscated, himself burnt in effigy if he could not XXX.

e apprehended in person, and every one inhibited harbour him under the pain of cursing and foreiture. The gentleman hearing of these proceedings, sted into England, where he was kindly reeived by Henry, and by him employed in a comnission to the Protestant Princes of Germany, for mutual confederacy in defence of their common rosession. Ten years after this he was sent by Edward VI. on an embassy to the King of Dennark about a marriage for the lady Elizabeth:

But what became of him afterwards, or whether is returned to his own country, we are not told.

Not farisfied with this appearance of feverity. he Cardinal next prevailed with the King to grant commission to a Sir James Hamilton of Finnard, natural brother of the Earl of Arran, and a cruel imbitious man, to convene before him all persons uspected of heresy, and punish them as he pleased. But this bloody commission was of short continuince: For the zealous inquisitor himself soon fell nto a fatal fnare, and being convicted of a plot against the King's life, was condemned to lose his lead, before he had time to answer the clergy's expectations in his new office. Yet they still reained their influence over the King, whether owng to his own necessities or to the Queen's interest with him, is hard to fay; and to luch a degree and they carried this influence, as to estrange him rom the nobility, and in a great measure to drive hem from the court. Indeed this is to be said or the King, that being a man of deep judgment and great penetration, and finding few of the principal nobility capable to ferve him for want of education and letters, he saw himself obliged to make 2 M 2

TETTER use of the clergy, and of gentlemen of insense XXX. rank, whose circumstances in the world required

Kelth's

Hift. p. 44.

them to cultivate their minds with learning, in order to obtain preferment. This we learn from a letter of Mr Sadler, who was ambassador here from Henry VIII. to a privy-counsellor of England, where he fays, "To be plain with you, I fee none " among the Scots nobility that hath any fuch a-" gility of gravity, wit, learning or experience, to "take in hand the direction of things, fo that the "King is of force driven to use the Bishops and " clergy as his only ministers for the direction of "his realm: They be the men of wit and policy that I see here." If this be true, (and Mr Sadler was a competent judge) it feems to vindicate the King from the imputation he lies under of difregarding his nobles, and shews that he was not fo much to blame for that conduct towards them, which, whatever was the cause of it, soon produced most lamentable effects.

> expectations of an interview so often frustrated, and being much chagrined at the repeated disappointment, resolved at last to take other measures; and for that purpose he fent a great army under the Duke of Norfolk, to the borders of Scotland; which, however, after burning a few hamlets, returned in a short time to their own country. King, having gathered an army of thirty thousand men, and irritated at this provoking infult, was very defirous to have followed Norfolk into England: But being advanced as far as Falamuir, and there finding an averseness in the Nobility from proceeding farther, and suspecting a design among them to cut off some of his principal favourites, he dismissed the army, and returned to

For his uncle Henry of England, finding his

Edinburgh in great discontent. Soon after, he LETTER again determined to profecute his scheme, and XXX. fent out his private letters to summon the Nobility, with their dependents and followers, to meet him at fuch a place. This fummons was readily obeyed, and a second army convened. But when, on the appearance of a few English troopers, who had been hastily raised on such a surprise, our army wished to know who was to command them as lieutenant under the King, and found that honour conferred on Oliver Sinclair, a private gen- Keith's tleman of the family of Roslin, (which yet is faid Hist. to have been a mistake), the old nobility were fo affronted at this indignity put upon them, that the greatest part of them willingly surrendered themselves to the small handful of English that appeared against them, without making so much as a shew of either resistance or defence.

The news of this shameful loss at the Solwaymarshes, which separate the two kingdoms on the West border, being brought to the King, who was at Carlaverock, about twelve miles distance, he became extremely disconsolate, and in great apprehension of a conspiracy, returned next day to Edinburgh. From thence he went to his palace at Falkland in Fife, where he gave himself up entirely to melancholy, and in this condition being told that the Queen was delivered of a daughter at Linlithgow, he was so oppressed with grief and corroding thoughts of various kinds, that in a few days after he expired on the thirteenth of December 1542, having lived thirty years, and some months, and leaving an infant heiress only a few days old. If we were to form a character of him, by comparing his censurer Buchanan with his panegyrist Bishop Leslie, the two historians

LETTER torians who were cotemporary with him, we might justly say, "it was a pity his life had been so short." His being fo much under the management of Cardinal Beton seems indeed to have been his ruin. What might have been the consequence of the personal conference, so often proposed, with his uncle, we cannot fay. As things then stood, it was a step not to be rashly taken: And his daughter's forrowful experience afterwards may in a good measure justify her father's averseness from the flattering, but dangerous proposal.

> The next reign will open up to us a full view of the Reformation in Scotland. But before we enter on this interesting scene, it will be proper that we confider how the business was going on in Germany, which was the first stage of that arduous undertaking. The last transaction that we mentioned of the Lutheran party was their protesting against the edict of Spires in the year 1529, which is the origin of the title of Protes-The next year the Protestant Princes met at Smalcalde, a city in Franconia, from an apprehension they had conceived, that the Emperor designed their utter ruin; and here they solemnly engaged themselves in a strict union to stand by one another, against all that should molest them in the exercise of their religion, and invited all the protestant cities of Germany to enter into the league. The fame year they presented to the Emperor and states of the empire, assembled at Augsburg in Swabia, a confession of their faith, which was principally drawn up by Melanchthon, and is called the Augustan confession, or confession of Augsburg. It is divided into two parts. The first part is an explication of their own doctrines, and confifts of twenty one chapters. The fecond fecond part is an express confutation of the seven Letter capital errors of the Romish church, which they XXX. found their separation upon, viz. Communion in one kind, forced celibacy of Priests, private masses, auricular confession, legendary traditions, monastic vows, and the excessive power of the church. The diet being for the most part of the Popish persuasion, would not admit the public reading of this confession, which the protestants strongly pressed for: But with the Emperor's confent, a conference was appointed to be held upon it, by an equal number of divines of both professions. On the first part they reasoned pretty amicably, and by concessions and explanations came to some kind of an agreement about fifteen of the twenty one articles. But in the fecond part, there was no fuch thing as yielding or altering on either fide: So that after much altercation the conference came to nothing, and both parties left the meeting, equally tenachous of their own opinions.

The next year the Protestants met a second time at Smalcalde, where they renewed their former consederacy, and sent delegates with a representation of their case to the Kings of France and England, both of whom received the application favourably, and gave assurance of their friendship. This union of the protestants had such an essect, that in a convention at Norimberg in the year 1532, the Emperor thought proper, by a decree, to grant them liberty of religion, and to prohibit their meeting with any trouble on that account, till a general council should be called, which the Protestants always demanded, and the Emperor declared he was still interceeding with the Pope to grant. About this time too,

LETTER the furious madness of the Anabaptists began XXX. to break out in Germany, which the Romanists would have been imputing to the new doctrines, tho' it is certain none were more zealous in suppressing these dangerous commotions than Luther and his followers. In the year 1537 Pope Paul made a pretence of convocating a general council at Mantua in Italy, which was objected to by all parties, and in a little time was given However, to make a shew of reformation, he gave a commission to four Cardinals and three Bishops to examine into the complaints about the ecclefiaftical administration, and to point out what they thought needed amendment, and how and to what lengths such amendment should go. This the commissioners did, in a long oration addressed to the Pope himself, and in which they ingenuously confess a number of disorders, and propose some faint measures of redress. But all was to no purpose. For the writing, tho' drawn up at the Pope's command, was never formally published, nor any use made of it: And the Pope continued to amuse the Emperor and other Princes with procrastinations and prorogations, from one place to another, and from year to year, having nothing in view but to carry as fair among the lay-powers, as possible, and to put off the meeting of a council at all, by proposing places which, he was sure, would not be accepted.

> In this posture stood the religious affairs of Germany at the period we are now come to: The Emperor on the Popish side, and the Protestant confederates on the other, engaged in mutual contentions, and Luther and his companions either disputing in person, or writing, when they faw it necessary, in defence of the reformation LETTER which they had begun, and now faw fo happily XXX. advanced. But about this time another reformer appeared, who, not fatisfied with Luther's plan. and finding fault with some of his tenets, as savouring too much of the old leaven, designed to let up a model of his own, and thereby to share at least in the reputation and praise which he saw bestowed on Luther and his associates. The new doctrines, as they were called, had before this penetrated into many places on the continent, as well as Germany, and amongst the rest into France, where not a few of all ranks, and conspicuous both for dignity and learning, had embraced them; and where the King Francis was upon every occasion committing some one or other of them to the flames, while at the fame time, for his own ends, he was leaguing with the German Lutherans, and cajoling them even with apologies for fuch a procedure.

Among the many learned men in France who had become acquainted with the new scheme, was Jean Chauvin, or John Calvin, a native of Noyon in Picardy, born in the year 1509, and ored to the civil law, which he studied first at Orleans, and then at Bourges. Having heard, as he grew up, of a reformation beginning, and finding it roughly handled in France, he retired o Basil in Switzerland, where he studied Hebrew. Here he wrote his book of Institutions in a good Latin stile, and dedicated it to King Francis, who, in all probability, never looked into it. From thence he went to Italy to the Duchess of Ferrara. fifter to the Queen of France, and a lady of great reading and knowledge, who received him kindly, as the much favoured that way. public 2 N

LETTER public appearance was at Geneva in the year 1536, XXX. where he was made Professor of divinity, and the next year got all the people to fwear folemnly to a confession of faith, containing, among other things, a renunciation of the Pope's authority. But proceeding further in his regulations than was consistent with the senatorial government of the city, he, with the two preachers Farel and Viret, was ordered to depart out of the town within two days, because they refused the communion to the people, unless they were entirely of Calvin's persuasion. On this he retired to Strafburg, where he fet up a French church, and was the first minister of it, tho' there is no certainty that ever he was in holy orders. In the year 1539 he was fent by the divines of Strafburg to assist at a diet which the Emperor had convened at Worms, for composing the religious disferences, and there he became acquainted with Melanchthon, with whom he had many communings on the subjects in agitation. But soon after, on a change of affairs in Geneva, he was invited back by the magistrates and people, which invitation he readily accepted, and returned to Geneva in September 1541. The first thing he now did, was to fettle a form of discipline and a confistorial jurisdiction, with a power to inslict censures and canonical penances even to excommunication. This was by many complained of, as by much too rigorous, and approaching too near to the old tyranny: But the matter was carried, and this new Canon legally passed in an assembly of all the people, on the twentieth of November 1541, the clergy and laity engaging themselves to an unalterable conformity to it.

Now, as this Genevan model of a church came

OF SCOTLAND.

467

in a short time to be much talked of in the island LETTER of Britain, particularly in our Northern part of it, XXX. we shall here take a short view of it, both in its rife and constitution. The city of Geneva, upon the Lake Leman, is of great antiquity, and had long been the fee of a Bishop, who, like the other Bishops of the Imperial cities of Germany, had a mixt jurisdiction with the civil magistrates who were elected by the community, but was never absolute Lord or Sovereign of it. The Dukes of Savoy in the neighbourhood oft laid claim to it as a part of their territory, and in defence of its freedom the city was frequently engaged in contentions with these Dukes, and with its own Bishops. Being about this time fore pressed by those powers, the Genevans entered into a confederacy with some of the nearest of the Swiss Cantons, among whom the feeds of Reformation had been early fown. For both Oecolampadius at Basil and Zuinglius at Zurich were co-eval with Luther, and had begun the work much about the fame time that he did: And tho' both these reformers agreed with Luther in most of his articles, especially in his darling and distinguishing tenet of justification by faith only, which all of them reckoned a fundamental article, yet they differed widely from him in the doctrine of the Eucharist or Lord's Supper, the Lutherans interpreting the words of institution, "This is my bo-"dy, &c." fimply and plainly, and admitting a true presence of the body and blood, along with the bread and wine, which has been amongst them called Conjubstantiation, while the others' have recourse to tropes and figures, and expound the words to mean no more but, "This fignifies or is a fign of my body, &c." Thus this Zuinglian 2 N n particu-

LETTER particularity got footing in Switzerland and its XXX. environs, and Calvin having been early at Basil when but a very young man, and probably while Oecolampadius lived, who died in 1531, might have learned there this diminishing notion, which he afterwards adopted into his doctrinal system, and which constitutes such an irreconcileable distinction between his followers and the Lutherans to this day.

It feems to have been by means of this confederacy, that the Genevans got the first notion of a reformation, which they began in the year 1527, by removing the images out of the churches; and a quarrel happening some time after between their Bishop and them about temporal prerogatives, contributed in end to the full and final establishment of it. For their now Bishop Peter de la Baulme, after having been at his own defire admitted by the community into the list of citizens and free Burghers in 1527, did the very next year leave the town, and, in support of the ambitious claim of his predecessors, made war against it. In 1533 he returned again in company of some of the confuls and fenators of Friburg, which then was and still continues a Popish Canton: But having privately made over his pretended fovereignty to the Duke of Savoy, and fearing the refentment of the people, if that private transaction should be known, he departed a fecond time of his own accord that fame year, and never returned. At this time the senate and ruling powers of the town were addicted to Popery, and continued fo for two years after the Bishop left it: For in the time of his first absence the senate made a decree for the preservation of the old Religion, and prohibiting to profess or counten; n:e the Lutheran doctrine.

OF SCOTLAND.

469

And even when the Bishop had withdrawn him-LETTER self the last time, many private persons who pro-XXX. sessed the reforming principles were driven out of the town, and among them their two preachers Frumentius and Camus. Yea, even in 1534 all manner of preaching was forbidden without the Bishop's licence, and the bibles, whether in French or German, condemned to be burnt: So that any rebellion against the Bishop as temporal Lord of Geneva was carried on by Papists, and the reformation, properly so called, does not fall to be charged with it.

However in the year 1535, being better instructed, and finding it convenient for the fituation of their affairs, the council of the city by a formal edict abolished the Romish form of religion, and to preserve to posterity a perpetual memorial of their forsaking the superstitions of that corrupt church, they fet up an inscription to that purpose engraved in golden letters upon a large plate of copper, which, we are told, remains in their townhouse to this day. Yet about two years after, the Duke of Savoy, seeing he could not prevail against the city by force, sent an ambassador to them with great promises of friendship if they would forsake the reformed religion, restore the images, turn out their ministers, and take back their Bishop. all which they answered, that " for their Bishop, " he should be welcome, so that he would remem-" ber his name and place, and do the work of a " Bishop according to the word of God: But for " the rest, they were to obey God rather than man, " and that as long as Geneva should remember she " was free and confecrated to God alone, it must " not be expected that they would again fet up " any thing tending to superstition." From

From all this it evidently appears that when Ge-XXX. neva first reformed, she did not then think it a neceffary part of reformation to abolish episcopacy as fuch, and that if their then Bishop would have concurred with them in the work, there might and would have been a regular episcopacy preserved there, as well as in England. But the Bishop, like most of his brethren prelates of those days, from the Pope downward, preferred the possession of his worldly pomp and grandeur to the execution of his spiritual and truly episcopal office, which it feems they imagined could not or needed not be carried on, when the temporal pillars of it were likely to be shaken. How far it was right in the Genevans to instal Mr. Calvin in the Bishop's room, or in him to take up fuch an office at his own hand or from their hands, is another question. But as it is acknowledged, that a fault was somewhere among them, there seems to be sufficient ground for dividing it between the Bishop and the town, and it may be fairly faid, that as he did not fo much as properly lay to his hand, they did more than lay to theirs. Yet it is certain that while they rejected popery, they did not at first condemn episcopacy as one of the corruptions of Even Calvin himself, whatever consequences against episcopacy might have been drawn from his practice, still professed a reverence for the name, and always wrote to and spoke of Bishops in a style which his followers foon thought fit to depart from. It is true, profession and practice do not always agree, and fo it was with him. For tho', in the complimenting letters which he wrote to the several Bishops with whom he corresponded, he feems only to find fault with the tyranny, as he called it, and imperious behaviour of the Bishops shops for some ages past, yet it is clear from the LETTER history of these times, that he himself, from the XXX. year 1541, when he was fully settled in the chair at the head of his consistory in Geneva, to the time of his death twenty four years after, acted in as arbitrary a manner, and issued out his decisions and sentences, thro' all the places that had espoused a reformation, with as much dictatorial assurance and approach towards infallibility, as perhaps any of his predecessors of a higher character had ever pretended to.

OF SCOTLAND.

47 I

But while the papal grandeur was thus attacked in that quarter, first by Luther and then by Calvin, these two distinguished heads of two capital denominations, there appeared in another quarter a new and unlooked-for support to it, by the starting up of a fingular order of men, as if for that very purpose: an order indeed which, from a very weak beginning, increased with amazing rapidity in a fhort time, and by monopolizing to themselves the peculiar appellation of the facred name of JESUS, continued for more than two hundred years to direct not only the ecclefiastical affairs, but even the politics of the greater part of Europe. fociety of Jesuits, owes its rife to an Ignatius Loyola, a Spanish soldier who was born in the year 1401, and having been confined to his bed by the wounds he had received at the fiege of Pampeluna in 1521, betook himself, by way of amusement, to reading the legendary lives of the Romish saints, which gave him a strong inclination to a retired On his recovery he went to Rome, and thence on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. At his return he began to study first at Barcelona, then at Alcala and Salamanca, and in 1528 went to Paris. Here he affociated himself to eight or nine more of the like

XXX

LETTER like stamp, and then going to Rome with his company, he there founded his fociety, gave them the name of Jesuits, and made rules and constitutions Pope Paul III. confirmed this fociety for them. by word of mouth in 1539, and the year following established it by an authentick Bull.* But of late years, by a joint complaint from all the Popish powers of Europe against them, for their troublesome and intermeddling spirit, the order was, after a great struggle, totally exauctorated by a formal Bull of the late Pope, and the fociety difpelled and scattered, where they could best be pro-The fathers, as they are called, of this fociety have had perpetual disputes with the other Popish doctors upon two very capital points: 1. Concerning predestination and grace with the old Thomists and modern Jansenists, who accuse the Jesuits of Pelagianism, while they on the other hand call them Manichees, and Predestinarians: And 2. About the obligations of morality, which the Janfenists say, the Jesuits miserably corrupt, and where it cannot be denied, their casuistry is extremely easy and indulgent, which no doubt, had been the principal recommendation that introduced them fo much to be confessors to the opulent and great. But the chief criterion which always rivetted them fo firmly in the Popes good graces, was their keen

and

^{*} Because at first their number was designed not to exceed fixty, another Bull was granted in 1543 to take off that restriction. Ignatius himself was their first General, as he was their original founder. He dyed in 1556, and was canonized by Pope Gregory XV. in 1622, at which time the order was possessed of 293 colleges, besides 123 houses, and their number was increased to 10581. In 1710, by a computation then made, they were found to possess 24 professed houses, 59 houses of probation, 340 residences, 612 colleges, 200 missions, 150 seminaries and boarding schools, and consisted of near 20000 members.

and unwearied labour in maintaining the infallibi-LETTER lity and absolute unlimited power of the Pope in XXX. almost every case spiritual or temporal: In which peculiarity of theirs, tho' there were many of the other Romanists who silently differed from them, yet except from the Gallican church they met with little or no public and avowed opposition. been shrewdly observed, (perhaps it will be faid with more shrewdness than folidity) that much the fame Æra produced two of the greatest enemies, tho' upon different principles, that ever primitive episcopacy had to grapple with, Loyola at Rome, and Calvin at Geneva. For whatever regard, either real or pretended, Calvin himself might have expressed for that ancient and apostolic order in the church, it is a fact that his followers, who to this day glory in his name, have always been of all the denominations of protestants, the bitterest opposers and revilers of the facred Hierarchy. And it is as certain that father Lainez, who was next General of the Jesuits after Loyola, and at the Pope's desire affished at the council of Trent, did there boldly and openly impugn the independency and authority of the episcopal order, which he impudently maintained was all inherent in and only derived from the Pope's fingle person, as the whole society continued to affert to the last moment of their existence. So that, whatever antipathy may be thought to fubfist between the Calvinists and Jesuits in most other articles, in this one, like Herod and Pilate on another occasion, they seem to agree as friends, only with this diversity of management, that what pre-eminence the Calvinist claims to what he calls the Consistory, or in the style of our country, the Presbytery, the Jesuit assigns

LETTER wholly to the Pope: And the original inftitution XXX. fuffers equally from both.

I am, &c.

END OF VOLUME FIRST.

m o

.

.

